

M E M O I R S

OF

HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY,

Sophia Charlotte.

—

PART II.

FAC SIMILÉ

OF HER MAJESTY'S WRITING.

PLATES

WHICH ILLUSTRATE THESE MEMOIRS.

Portrait of HER MAJESTY, at the time of her Marriage	to face the general title.
PALACE of STREMITZ	Page 43
BUCKINGHAM HOUSE	148
Portrait of HER MAJESTY in advanced life to face title to Part II.
Portrait of THE KING.....	275

THE QUEEN'S LODGE, WINDSOR,(with the Letter-Press)....	397
WINDSOR CASTLE.....ditto.....	463
FROGMORE	502
KEW PALACE....	560
THE ROYAL VAULT, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, ditto	590

Since the printing of the last sheet, the author has been apprised of the two following inadvertencies that have escaped him, and which he takes this opportunity of correcting.

The first regards the sepulture of the late Duke of Gloucester, who, instead of being interred in the royal mausoleum constructed by the orders of His Majesty, was buried in the vault previously occupied by the remains of the infant daughter of his royal highness in the choir near the sovereign's stall of St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

The second is where Lady de Clifford is said to have given designs for a set of porcelain, instead of having only selected them. *

PART II.

CHAPTER XII.

Riots in London.—Firmness of their Majesties.—Birth of Prince Alfred.—Arrival of Prince William-Henry.—Parting Scene between the two eldest Princes.—Social Esteem.—Prince of Wales declared of Age.—Rejoicings on that Event.—Purchase of Kew.—Character of the Queen.—Anecdote of Princess Mary.—Celebration of Her Majesty's Birth-day in 1782.—Death of Prince Alfred.—Arrival of the Prince of Mecklenburg.—Story of Edward and Egwina.

THE dreadful riots which laid a great part of the capital in ashes, and struck terror through the nation, in the summer of 1780, broke out while their majesties were at Buckingham House, for the celebration of the birth-day. But, while the magistracy shrunk from their duty, and even the ministers of state appeared panic-struck, the King acted with becoming coolness and energy. The Queen also, though in a state of pregnancy, remained at her palace, when the ladies of the court were hurrying out of town with their jewels. His Majesty sat up two nights with the Guards, in the riding-house, which he only left at intervals to give information to the Queen, and to inspire her with confidence. To this resolution of the monarch, the metropolis was indebted for its deliverance; for, having called a council to consider the question, whether the military could be authorized in dispersing the mob without the previous form of reading the riot-act, the King alone decided the point by signing an order to that purpose. In consequence of this prompt measure, Lord Amherst proceeded vigorously against the rioters; and thus, in a short space, order was restored.

After these disgraceful scenes, their majesties removed to Windsor Lodge, where the Queen, on the twenty-second of September, being the anniversary of the coronation, was delivered of a son, who was baptized on the second of the following month, at St. James's, by the name of Alfred, the two elder princes standing as godfathers, and the princess-royal as godmother.

On the twenty-sixth of December, the royal family were gratified by the safe arrival of Prince William-Henry from the fleet; but this pleasure was damped in some measure, four days afterward, by the departure of his brother Frederick for Germany, where his royal highness intended to continue some years, for the completion of his military studies. The parting scene at Buckingham House was represented as a very moving one: the King and Queen shed tears on taking leave of a favourite.

son; and the Prince of Wales, in particular, was so much concerned at being deprived, for a long period, of the sole companion of his youth, that he was several minutes unable to speak. This sensibility was not more indicative of innate goodness of heart than it was an evidence of the care that had been taken by their majesties to cultivate in the royal progeny a constant regard to the social affections. Indeed, such was the attention paid to this essential consideration, that nothing like warmth of temper, or the quick expression of resentment, was ever suffered in the royal presence. Both the King and Queen, on all occasions, preserved the utmost equanimity themselves; and whenever either of them happened to be offended, it was seen at once by a certain gravity of manner, and not discovered by an asperity of language. Hence, all the children acquired a similar spirit of self-command; and, what was of equal moment, they learnt from parental example to cherish for each other that esteem which has been the general characteristic of the family through life.

On the first of January, 1781, his royal highness the Prince of Wales was declared to be of age, and as such he appeared at court, which was much crowded in consequence; but more so on Her Majesty's birth-day, when the assemblage of fashion was splendid beyond what had been seen there for several years. In honour of the same circum-

the Queen, a month afterwards, gave a ball and supper at her palace, under the immediate direction of the Earl of Aylesbury, recently appointed chamberlain of the household. The evening's entertainment was preceded by a concert, at which were present, besides their majesties and the royal family, a select party, only of the nobility. At ten o'clock the company assembled, proceeded to the ball-room, which was nearly filled by persons of fashion, and a little after twelve the whole retired to supper in another room, where three tables were laid. At the first sat the King, the Queen, ladies of the bed-chamber, the master of the horse, the lord chamberlain, and some other state officers immediately about the palace: at the second sat the Prince of Wales, with several of the younger nobility of both sexes; and at the third the secretaries of state and other persons of distinction.

But this festive scene was surpassed by the celebration of the Prince's birth-day at Windsor, the same year. On the morning of the twelfth of August, the roads were covered with carriages filled with persons of rank and fashion, hastening to pay their homage on the glad occasion; and in the evening the terrace was so crowded, that their majesties and the princesses were obliged to retire into the castle, after walking about half-an-hour. The next day there was a grand review in the park, after which the royal family proceeded to St.

George's Hall, where they dined with about eighty of the nobility; and in the evening there was a grand supper and ball, which last did not break up till five in the morning. The town of Windsor was also illuminated, and the day closed with bonfires and other demonstrations of joy.

Among other improvements that took place at Windsor, under the direction of Her Majesty, at this time, was that of converting the gallery, called the Queen's closet, in the chapel, into a royal pew, for the accommodation of herself and the King during divine service—a point of duty, which, in their estimation, was of the first consequence, and in the discharge of which they were never known to fail.

Though Windsor had now the preference, Kew was not altogether neglected; and in this year the freehold of it was purchased for Her Majesty, from the descendants of Sir Richard Lovett, by whom it was bought in 1697. Up to the present date it had been held on a long lease, granted originally to Queen Caroline. Kew House, the residence for many years of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and his widow, was also purchased of the dowager Countess of Essex, by the King, on the expiration of the lease, with the view of erecting an extensive mansion on the scite, for the sole use of Her Majesty, who might be able to call it her own in the event of his demise.

About this time, Martin Sherlock, a literary coxcomb, indeed, but by no means an inaccurate deli-

peator of men and manners, thus sketched the character of Her Majesty in a letter to his French correspondent :

“ Our Queen is neither a wit nor a beauty, She is prudent, well-informed, has an excellent understanding, and is very charitable. I spent three months in the country where she was born; and the people there have quick conceptions, and are well-natured. Her Majesty has an elegant person, good eyes, good teeth, a Cleopatra nose, and fine hair. The expression of her countenance is pleasing and interesting: it is full of sense and good-temper. She loves domestic pleasures; is fonder of diamonds than the Queen of France; as fond of snuff as the King of Prussia; is extremely affable, very pious, and is praised by all the world, at home and abroad.”

This lively writer might have added, that the Queen of England did not affect splendour in her apparel; that she seldom wore jewels except on public ceremonies; and that, so far from devoting her hours to dress, she studied neatness and simplicity. Her conduct exactly resembled that of Cornelia, who, being asked by a Roman lady of rank for a sight of her toilet, waved the subject till her children came from school, and then said: “ These, Madam, are my ornaments.” In like manner did Her Majesty look upon the progeny which surrounded her, as a circle more valuable than diamonds; and she made it her constant object to render them deserving of parental pride, by instilling into their minds the purest principles. The manner in which she trained them to knowledge and application may be gathered from a single incident which happened at this very period: when the Princess Mary, now between five and six years old, came running with a book in her hand, and tears in her eyes, to the Queen, saying: "Madam, I cannot comprehend it," Her Majesty, with true parental affection, looked upon the child, and told her not to be alarmed. "What you cannot comprehend to-day you may comprehend to-morrow; and what you cannot attain to this year you may arrive at the next. Do not, therefore, be frightened with little difficulties; but attend to what you do know, and the rest will come in time."

On the eighteenth of January, 1782, the drawing-room held for Her Majesty's birth-day was particularly brilliant, on account of the first public appearance of the princess-royal, who opened the ball with her brother. One feature worth observing on this occasion was the circumstance that his royal highness wore that day a richly embroidered waistcoat, embroidered by the hands of his august parent, who had a double pleasure in this performance; for, besides seeing her son adorned with the work of her own hands, she brought tambour into fashion, and thereby encouraged industry. Thus to her might have been applied the eulogium of the vir-tuous woman in sacred writ : " She laid her hands to the spindle, and her hands held the distaff. She stretched out her hand to the poor; yea, she stretched forth her hand to the needy. She opened her mouth with wisdom, and her tongue was the law of kindness. She looked well to the ways of her household, and did not eat the bread of idleness. Her children rose up and called her blessed: her husband also, and he praised her."

But while their majesties were thus rejoicing in the introduction of the elder children on the theatre of public life, they experienced a damp in witnessing the declining state of the youngest prince, who, in the beginning of the summer, was sent by the direction of the physicians to the sea-side, without receiving any benefit; and, on the twenty-second of August, he expired in the arms of Lady Charlotte Finch, at Buckingham House, aged one year and ten months.

On the twenty-seventh, between six and seven in the morning, the body was conveyed in a private manner to Henry the Seventh's chapel in Westminster Abbey, and there interred in the royal vault, the service being read by the dean. At the time of this loss, the family was in mourning for Her Majesty's sister, who died of a lingering consumption, early in the summer. At the beginning of October, however, the Queen received the unexpected pleasure of seeing her brother, the Prince of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, who, with his consort, came over to England, attended by some persons of distinction, and remained here several weeks.

In closing this chapter, and the history of the year, I am tempted to insert a little tale, which was written at this time by one whose pen has been since employed on many works of importance. The present is one of those narratives in which a slight historic fact serves as a basis for the construction of an interesting story. But, to proceed to the romance.

“ In proportion as refinement proceeds, gallantry increases. The reign of the illustrious Alfred was not more favourable to heroism and science than to love. His son Edward possessed a large portion of his father's virtues; and while he sat upon the throne, cultivated those arts which Alfred had encouraged. His heart was susceptible of the tender passions, and of the power of beauty. In one of his excursions he met with a lovely shepherdess, named Egwina. The prince was captivated with her charms. Honour governed his actions, and subjected his desires to the controul of virtue. He wished to exalt her situation, not to debase her innocence. In short, he wished her for his queen; but this seemed impossible. He returned dejected to his palace: he regretted that high rank stood as a bar to his happiness: he consulted his favourite friend and minister: he urged the beauty, the virtue, the genius of Egwina; but all in vain.

The reply was, that policy required him to seek a union with some exalted character, allied to a powerful and wealthy prince; and that if he were to place a shepherdess on the throne, his nobles would be disgusted, quit his court, and probably proceed by open violence to resent the supposed insult to their dignity. The prince admitted that what was said was too likely to be the fact, and reprobated that pride which deemed an alliance with indigent and untitled virtue disgraceful; but he knew the prejudices of his nobility were unconquerable. He submitted, repining and reluctantly, to his fate; yet he frequently visited the shepherdess; and her conversation was his greatest delight. There was something mysterious to him in her deportment and accomplishments. She possessed the strictest appearance of innocence, without the least embarrassment. Though plainly attired, she stepped with superior grace; and in every action exhibited courtly propriety and ease. Though her observations were chiefly upon her flocks and rural happiness, yet she would occasionally surprise the prince with remarks upon astronomy, history, morals, and agriculture, which bespoke a mind informed above the common level. Thus engaging, it was not to be wondered at that every additional visit increased the admiration and astonishment of the enamoured Edward. His passions grew stronger every moment: his dignity, was his torture: his friends and flatterers tried in vain to divert his thoughts or alleviate his distress,

The greatest beauties of his palace courted his smiles without effect: their charms served but to remind him of the superior ones of his beloved Egwina. Nothing induced him to retain existence but the trying task of parting, perhaps for ever, from his captivating shepherdess. He often thought to ask her for the story of her life, but dreaded that the narrative would only confirm his misery.

“ Upon one of his visits, he missed her at the accustomed spot, but found a venerable old man attending on her sheep. The prince enquired eagerly for Egwina, and was informed that she was at a neighbouring cottage. She had acquainted her father that she often had a visitor when keeping her flocks in the fields; and from her description the old man conceived the prince to be the person, and accordingly invited him to their habitation. Edward, for a while, threw off his courtly ceremony, and accepted of the invitation. He went on with sorrowing steps, and yet would not have staid behind. The sight of the cottage damped him, but that of its fair tenant cheered his spirits. He found in the place neatness and rural elegance. He would have gladly parted with his dignity and power. He would have been happy to have changed his sceptre for a shepherd’s crook, and his splendid palace for this humble residence. He was courted to refresh himself; but though the table was spread with healthful rustic dainties, he could not partake of the feast. Egwina’s charms and conversation were his regalement. He derived momentary comfort from the cause of his permanent misery. The old man apologized for the homeliness of his fare, imagining that to occasion the abstinence of his guest, and said, 'that once he could have entertained him better, but now he had little more to offer than a hearty welcome.' At these words, the hopes of the prince were raised: his attention was fixed to the story of their fortunes, which he begged the father to relate. The old man proceeded thus: 'I formerly was Earl of Morcar. Our family was of royal descent, and my possessions in lands, flocks, and herds, exceedingly extensive and valuable: I lived in becoming splendour; honoured by my illustrious and royal master, Alfred, justly styled the great. I was beloved by my neighbours, and happy in my family. My estate was situated on the borders of the Scottish lands, and frequently invaded by the highland plunderers. For a long time, my tenants and servants bravely repelled their attacks; but, at length increasing in their numbers, we were overpowered. They spoiled and ravaged all our lands, and drove away our flocks and herds, save a small portion, with which I hither flew to find security. Here have I since lived, suppressed my title, and passed myself for a poor old shepherd; this, my humble but affectionate daughter, the comfort and support of my declining years.' The prince struggled to conceal the sweet emotions which he felt at this narration, and asked the old man whether he had, applied at court for succour in his distress. His question was answered thus: 'No; my family, consisting but of myself and young Egwna, and my desires confined to narrow bounds, by the wise dictates of philosophy, I thought it unjust to ask of my country that support which industry could insure, and thus deprive more useful subjects of their just reward.' The prince admired the generous spirit of the venerable sage, told him he had interest at court, that the king wished to see him, and insisted that he and his daughter should hasten thither, which journey, after much hesitation, they agreed to undertake. It is impossible to describe the transports of young Edward on this occasion. He flew back to his palace, eager to prepare for his expected and welcome visitors. The scene was now changed from the most deep despondency to the most complete joy and felicity. At the appointed time, the old shepherd and his fair daughter arrived at court; and having recovered their surprise, the king introduced them in their rural habits. Time and disguise prevented the nobility from recollecting the earl; and Egwina had never been seen in public. As companions of the prince, the courtiers were obliged to receive them with civility; but their affected politeness could not conceal their absolute contempt. The court broke up, and the king again engaged in conversation with the earl. He requested to know whence his daughter derived so much knowledge; to which the earl replied: 'From my own poor stock : as she was my sole companion, I thought it my interest as well as duty to teach her every science I knew. She had a comprehensive mind, and easily received instruction.' In a few days, the king assembled his courtiers again. He had previously advised with his councillors on the propriety of a marriage with an earl's daughter of royal descent, and received a favourable answer. He then introduced the old man as Earl of Morcar, and the shepherdess as his daughter Egwina. Shame seized the ungenerous nobility ; but the kindness of the offended parties soon removed their embarrassment. Matters being duly prepared and settled between the king, the earl, and his daughter, Edward now declared his intention of espousing Egwina, and the ceremony was immediately performed. In a few days the coronation took place, and the royal shepherdess lived long, happy, and beloved, the Queen of England. At her death universal grief prevailed. But the people of those days lived for posterity, not for themselves, and were consoled by the prophecy of a favourite priest, which has proved strictly true, 'that in future times, a CHARLOTTE should arise that would restore to the English throne the majestic virtues of Egwina.'

CHAPTER XIII.

Restoration of Peace.—Anecdote of the Queen.—Mr. Hutton and Dr. Franklin.—Death of Prince Octavius.—Birth of Princess Amelia.—City Address.—Mrs. Siddons at Buckingham House.—Commemoration of Handel.—Account of Mademoiselle Paradis.—Royal Visit to Nuneham and Oxford.—Death of Prince George of Mecklenburg.—Anecdote of Royal Benevolence.

WITH the new year, 1783, came in the blessing of peace, not more to the gratification of the public than of their majesties: and here I may be permitted to observe, that though the Queen had scrupulously avoided from the moment of her landing in England all interference in politics, the American war gave her much concern, and she endeavoured, with the knowledge of her royal consort, to procure a termination of the differences between the two countries. The instrument employed in this good work was Mr. James Hutton, a Moravian minister, in Fetter Lane, who had free access at Buckingham House; he being, in fact, Her Majesty's private almoner. Charity was the darling object of this ex-extraordinary man, whose whole life, which was prolonged to a patriarchal extent, was devoted to the benefit of his fellow-creatures. The benevolent disposition of Mr. Hutton, and his religious principles, rendered him a favourite at the Queen's house; and both their majesties delighted much in his cheerful and pious conversation. The society also to which he belonged was one for which the Queen ever entertained a predilection, as well on account of the discipline observed, as the doctrines professed by the United Brethren. The spirit of love which pervades the whole system, indeed, could not but render this branch of the Christian family acceptable to one who made it her constant study to mould her own temper after the purest of all patterns. Her Majesty did not, it is true, avow any connexion with the church of the brethren; nor was it needful that she should, since in faith, worship, and government, that community is in perfect unison with the national establishment. But to return to Mr. Hutton. This good man numbered among his many acquaintances the celebrated Dr. Franklin, with whom he had contracted an intimacy, when that extraordinary character was nothing more than a journeyman printer. Their friendship lasted through life; and it continued unabated even when Franklin rose to the station of a public agent, though in religious and political sentiments no two men could be more dissimilar. After the acknowledgment of the American states by the court of France, and the admission there of Franklin as the minister of the new republic, Mr. Hutton opened a correspondence with him, with a view to conciliation. On the same mission he also went over to Paris by the way of Holland ; but the man of politics was too much for the honest Christian ; and the latter saw at last that the simplicity of the dove is no match when opposed to the cunning of the serpent. He was completely deceived by glosing professions ; and all that he had to console him under the disappointment was the approbation of his illustrious employers, and the perfect conviction of their sincerity.

Happily, however, the victory of Rodney in the West Indies, and the defeat of the Spaniards before Gibraltar, made the allied powers in Europe as desirous of peace as the people of this country could be ; and the preliminary articles with France being ratified, a general termination of this eventful and sanguinary conflict soon followed.

Shortly after this, their majesties sustained a severe shock in the loss of Prince Octavius, who died of the small pox at Kew, on the third of May, 1783, in the fifth year of his age. His royal highness was reckoned one of the finest of the royal progeny ; and the portrait of him by Gainsborough warrants the opinion. He was besides remarkably docile in his disposition, and so very good-natured, as to be almost idolized by the domestics. On the tenth of the same month the body was removed from Kew, attended by General Carpenter and some of His Majesty's household, to Henry the Seventh's chapel, and there deposited near the remains of Prince Alfred. The death of this engaging child had a very serious effect upon the spirits of the Queen, who being then in a pregnant state, felt the catastrophe more keenly and that to such a degree, as to render her recovery for some time exceedingly doubtful. At length, the excellence of her constitution triumphed over the malady, and on the seventh of August she was happily delivered of a daughter at Buckingham House.

On the nineteenth of the following month, at seven in the evening, the ceremony of christening the young princess was performed at St. James's Palace. The peers and peeresses, foreign ministers and their ladies, assembled in the Queen's drawing-room sometime before the ceremony, and from thence were introduced into the grand council-chamber, where Her Majesty sat on an elegant bed of white satin, under a superb canopy of crimson velvet embroidered with gold. On the right side of the bed stood the King, at the feet his royal highness the Prince of Wales, the Princess-Royal, and Princess Augusta; and on each hand the rest of the royal children, arranged according to their ages. The great officers of state, the royal attendants, foreign ministers, peers, and peeresses, formed the outer circle. The service was performed by Dr. Moore, Archbishop of Canterbury; the Prince of Wales, Princess-Royal, and Princess Augusta being sponsors; the former acting as proxy for the Princess Amelia, whose name was given to the royal infant. After the baptismal ceremony, Her Majesty received the congratulations of the company, who, on the King's retiring, withdrew to visit the royal nursery, where, according to custom, they were entertained with cake and caudle. The brilliancy of this lively scene was heightened in effect by the appearance of the royal offspring round their august parents, forming altogether a spectacle not to be equalled in any part of Europe.

The corporation of London presented separate addresses to the King and Queen, in which were comprehended a threefold congratulation on the birth of a princess, the recovery of Her Majesty, and the attainment of the Prince of Wales to his twenty-first year. In their address to the King, the body corporate paid the following compliment: "We would express with more than ordinary effusions of joy our feelings upon this occasion, that Providence has been pleased to answer the prayers and wishes of every order of your majesty's loyal subjects, in preserving the invaluable life of our gracious Queen; a life so eminently useful, and so conspicuously exemplary."

The address to Her Majesty, which was carried up to St. James's by the lord-mayor, sheriffs, and a very numerous train of aldermen and common-council, ran in these words :

“ We, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, humbly beg leave to approach your majesty with the most sincere congratulations upon the birth of another princess, and your majesty's happy recovery.

“ Permit us further, Madam, to congratulate your majesty upon his royal highness the Prince of Wales having attained his age of twenty-one years ; and we sincerely hope and trust that he will fill the important station to which he is called with dignity to himself and prosperity to his country.”

To this address a suitable though short answer was returned ; and all the gentlemen had the honour to kiss Her Majesty's hand.

The celebrity of Mrs. Siddons, who at this time shone forth with extraordinary lustre as a tragic actress in London, frequently drew the royal family to the theatre ; but one night, while that great performer was in a pathetic part of the character of Euphrasia, the business of the scene was strangely interrupted by a voice from the upper gallery, exclaiming : “ Your Majesty had the goodness to promise me one of your blessed princesses in marriage.” An uproar ensued, but the fellow by some means or other escaped. Soon after this, Mrs. Siddons had an interview with the Queen at Buckingham House; when, at the express desire of both their majesties, she undertook the honourable office of instructing the two younger princesses in reading and enunciation.

The next year was rendered remarkable by the great musical festival instituted in commemoration of Handel, and conducted under the patronage of their majesties. The design of this extraordinary entertainment originated with two or three persons of distinction, who wished for a periodical celebration of that mighty master of harmony, in a public performance of his works, the profits of which were to be appropriated to the musical fund. This idea being suggested to others, and particularly the directors of the concert of ancient music, met with their entire approbation; but while the matter was yet in embryo, the King hearing of it, immediately expressed his resolution that the scheme should be carried into execution. Accordingly, application was made to Bishop Thomas, as Dean of Westminster, for the use of the abbey, who readily granted the request, on condition that a moiety of the profits of the first day should be given to the Westminster Infirmary. To this no objection could be made; and Mr. Wyatt, the architect, was directed to fit up the abbey with all expedition, for the accommodation of their majesties, the company, and the per-

On Wednesday, the twenty-sixth of May, this grand festival began; and before ten in the morning the company assembled in prodigious numbers, so that in about an hour the venerable pile was nearly filled, chiefly with ladies. Their majesties arrived about a quarter past twelve o'clock; and when the King came into his box, he stood for some moments seemingly lost in astonishment at the sublimity of the spectacle; nor did the brilliancy of the appearance less affect the feelings of the Queen, who viewed it with rapture, and repeatedly expressed her admiration to those around her. The royal pair were accompanied by prince Edward and the Princess-Royal, who sat on the King's right, and the princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, and Sophia, who sat on the Queen's left hand, all in one box, which was most superbly ornamented with crimson velvet.

The festival then began with the coronation anthem, in the execution of which were fully displayed the amazing powers of the band, consisting of more than five hundred performers. Mr. Bates, who was the conductor of the whole, appeared throughout so agitated and inflamed by the subject, that his instrument, though immense in its tones, could hardly give utterance to his ideas. Such was the first day's exhibition of this splendid entertainment. On the following evening, the festival was renewed at the Pantheon, which presented a most beautiful appearance; the dome being illuminated with seven thousand lamps, in compartments, and terminating at the top of the cupola in a beautiful figure. Over the entrance, and directly opposite the orchestra, a gallery was erected, supported by six Ionic columns; and in the centre was placed the royal box, lined with crimson satin, and mirrors fringed with gold. About eight o'clock, their majesties, accompanied by Prince Edward and three of the princesses, arrived; soon after which the performance began, of which, it may be said, that if the music in the abbey was the sublime, this of the Pantheon was the beautiful, of Handel.

In this night's performance, Madame Mara displayed all the wonders of her voice, which reached even the compass of an instrument. The selection of pieces did infinite credit to the directors, and the execution was such as to leave no room for criticism. Mr. Bates played the organ with the same touch as he did at the abbey, and the harmony in all the parts was complete.

The next day was employed in the rehearsal of the Messiah, which master-piece of Handel was performed at the abbey on the twenty-ninth; and though to common ears familiarity of sounds takes away much from the effect produced by the charms of novelty, yet, on this occasion, almost every spectator felt indescribable sensations. Their majesties were attended by five princesses; and it was evident throughout the whole of the performance how much they enjoyed the delicious banquet to which might have been applied the language of the poet:

And the well-balance'd world on hinges hung.
His constellations set,
While the Creator great
But when of old the sons of morning sung,
Before was never made,
Such music (as 'tis said)

On the third of June, the performance, by the command of the King, consisted of a selection made under the direction of His Majesty; and on the fifth of the same month the commemoration concluded with the Messiah, by order of the Queen, when, though the crowd was less than on the preceding occasion, the exhibition was more splendid. Indeed, as a spectacle, it was so magnificent to the sight, and as a musical performance so mellifluous and grateful to the ear, that it would have been no less difficult for the mind's eye of those who were absent to form an adequate idea of the show, than for the mental ear to have formed any of the sounds from mere description.

There was an ingenious device in the manner of executing the music to "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," by causing the whole chorus from each side of the orchestra, in conjunction with all the instruments, to burst forth at once "He is the King of Glory," which had such an admirable effect, as to bring tears into the eyes of several of the performers themselves. Nor was this effect confined to the orchestra: the whole auditory felt a sympathetic emotion; and His Majesty was pleased to make a signal himself for the repetition of this, and the final chorus in the last part. Thus ended this grand festival, the like of which had never been exhibited in any country; nor is it probable that any thing on such a scale will ever again recur.

The royal donation to the fund on this occasion was five hundred guineas, and the receipts exceeded twelve thousand pounds, out of which six thousand were given to the society for decayed musicians, and one thousand to the hospital.

Another festival took place at the abbey the following year; but though their majesties were present, and the spectacle, as well as the performance, had an impressive effect, the entertainment fell somewhat short of the former one, both in sublimity and produce; and after three or four exhibitions of the same nature, they ceased entirely, owing, as was alleged, to apprehensions for the safety of the church.

The present subject naturally introduces the remarkable story of a blind lady, who, at the period of which we are speaking, excited considerable attention in the musical world. This young person was the daughter of M. Paradis, alic counsellor in the imperial service. At the age of two years and eight months she became suddenly blind, through a fright; and though the most skillful oculists in Venice were applied to, the case was found to be hopeless. At seven years old she discovered an ear for music, which taste being encouraged, she was able at the age of ten to accompany herself on the organ in the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, of which she sang a part at St. Augustine's Church, in the presence of the empress-queen, Maria Theresa, who was so touched with her misfortune and performance, that she settled a pension on her for life, of which provision she was afterwards deprived in a most extraordinary manner. At the age of eighteen, the noted Dr. Mesmer, who pretended to cure all ills by animal magnetism, undertook to restore sight to the unfortunate Mademoiselle Paradis; an offer which was gladly accepted, and she was placed under his care as a boarder. After some months, however, it was found that the professions of this empiric were fallacious, and his patient was taken from his house, which so exasperated Mesmer, that he had the audacity and cruelty to charge the poor girl with being an impostor, saying that she could see as well as himself, and that she only counterfeited blindness to retain her pension. Strange as it may seem, this abominable falsehood was believed; or, if not, it was made the pretext for withdrawing the pension; in consequence of which the helpless victim of quackery left Vienna with her mother, and after visiting several courts on the continent, where her talents and misfortunes procured her many favours, she came over to London, bringing with her letters of recommendation to the Queen, upon whom she waited at Windsor, and was received with the utmost kindness. Her Majesty took a most lively interest in the young stranger, who, under such patronage, became an object of notice among the nobility, and in consequence acquired a handsome independence.

On Monday, the fifteenth of October, 1785, their majesties, with the princes Ernest, Augustus, and Adolphus; the Princess-Royal, princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, paid a visit to Lord and Lady Harcourt at Nuneham, with the intention of returning to Windsor the same evening; but the conversation happening to turn upon Oxford, and the Queen saying she should like to see a place of which she had heard so much, it was resolved to go thither in a private manner the next day. Accordingly, the royal party slept at Nuneham that night, and on Tuesday morning, about ten o'clock, their majesties, with their children and the Earl and Countess of Harcourt, arrived at Oxford in five carriages; and passing through the fields behind Merton College, alighted at Christ Church, and entering the cathedral at prayer-time, took their seats during divine service, after which they were conducted to the hall, the dean's apartments, and the library. From honour of knighthood conferred upon him. Their respects to the royal visitors; and the former had the and corporation of Oxford attended to pay their respect to the council-chamber, where the mayor proceeded to the observatory. From this place the family pro- library, chapel, and hall of St. John's, and next to whence they passed through the gardens into the the chapel and library at New College; from these public edifices, their majesties went to see had the honour of kissing hands. On leaving marbles, and the music-school, where the professor after which, they saw the Pomfret and Arundelian royal party were conducted to the picture-gallery; leian library was next visited; and from thence the honour of kissing their majesties' hands. The Bod- vernal heads of colleges and the proctors, had the se- for some time; and the vice-chancellor, with the se- this magnificent room the royal family were seated culties, were already assembled. In the area of heads of houses, and the doctors in their several fa- school, were ushered into the theatre, where the eastern gates, and passing through the divinity- ties from hence entered the public schools at the and thence to the Radclivian library. Their majes- majesties, and attended them to Merton College, with their staves inverted, paid his respects to their president of St. John's, preceded by the beadles College, where Dr. Dennis, the vice-chancellor, and Christ Church, they proceeded to Corpus-Christi majesties from hence visited All Souls, Queen's, and Magdalen Colleges; and, having seen the chapels, libraries, and whatever was most worthy of observation, they quitted Oxford for Lord Harcourt's, where an elegant cold collation waited their arrival; and they set out for Windsor about seven the same evening.

In the following winter, the Queen received the afflicting news of the death of her youngest brother, Prince George of Mecklenburg; on which account the celebration of Her Majesty's birth-day was put off to the ninth of February, when an elegant court assembled early, to pay the usual marks of loyalty and affection. In the evening the ball-room was highly splendid, and exhibited an uncommon display of female beauty. The King and Queen separately addressed every lady within the circle assigned to the dancers; during which period a prelude was played, and also some of Handel's music. The ball terminated between twelve and one, after which their majesties and the princesses retired. The prince remained some time in conversation with the ladies, and on his withdrawing, the company began immediately to depart; but it was not till near three in the morning that the court was entirely cleared. The most remarkable person at the ball was the ambassador from Tripoli, attended by his page of honour and secretary: all of them were dressed in the habits of their country, and appeared much delighted and astonished at the crowd of beauties that surrounded them ; nor were they less objects of wonder to our fair countrywomen, who beheld with admiration the flowing beard of the venerable Mussulman.

From the scene of joy and splendour, the reader will not be offended at being conducted to one of woe and wretchedness, where royalty will be seen in more lustre than when surrounded by a circle of courtiers.

The winter of this year was a very severe one ; but though the snow lay thick upon the ground, the King did not intermit his customary walks, in which he was frequently unattended, even by a single servant. One day, during this cheerless season, he met two little boys, the eldest not more than nine years old, who, without knowing whom they addressed, fell upon their knees, and prayed for relief, as they were very hungry and had nothing to eat. His Majesty, shocked at the sight, tenderly desired the weeping suppliants to rise, and having encouraged them to proceed in their story, they said that their mother had been dead three days, and still lay unburied ; that their father himself was stretched by her side upon a bed of straw, in a sick and helpless condition, being totally destitute of money, bread, and fuel.

This little story of misery touched the heart of the King, who ordered the boys to go before him to their wretched hovel, where he found the whole realized to the utmost extent of human misery—the mother being dead, apparently from the want of common necessities, and the father ready to perish also, being unable to raise himself; but still encircling with his enfeebled arm the deceased partner of his woes.

The King dropped a tear at the sad spectacle, left what cash he had about him, which seldom amounted to much, and hastened back to Windsor, where he related to Her Majesty what he had seen; and servants were instantly despatched with a supply of provisions, clothing, coals, and every other accommodation that might afford comfort to a family, groaning, as the King declared, under afflictions more piercing by far than he could have supposed to exist in any part of his dominions, and which he could hardly believe to have any reality in a Christian country, had he not himself witnessed them.

Revived by the bounty of the monarch, the poor man soon recovered; and his Majesty finished the good work he had so graciously begun, by giving orders that the children should be clothed, educated, and supported, at his expense, with the farther intention of providing for them as their conduct merited.

CHAPTER XIV.

Their Majesties visit Cheltenham.—Departure from Visits to Gloucester and Worcester.—Their Majesties visit Cheltenham.—Anecdotes.—Royal of Warren Hastings.—Indisposition of the King.—
 Visit to Mr. Whitbread.—Private Theatricals.—Trial —Economy of Charity.—Gainsborough the Painter.—
 fronage of Sunday Schools.—Account of Mrs. Trimmer.— visit to Vanehan, Oxford, and Bleanheim.—Royal Pa-Conduct of the Spanish Ambassador.—Their Majesties, an Eastern Prince.—Attempt to assassinate the King.— bury.—Birth-day of the King.—Present of Jewels from Their Majesties Sponsors for the Daughter of Lord Salis-

The Countess of Salisbury being delivered of a daughter, after an interval of sixteen years, occasioned great rejoicings in that noble family; and the christening, which took place on the twenty-seventh of April, 1786, at his lordship's house in Arlington Street, was distinguished in a very remarkable manner, their majesties, with the princess-royal, attending as sponsors in person.

The Queen received the child from Lady Essex, and the archbishop from Her Majesty, who, at the same time, gave it the name of Georgiana-Charlotte; which was also inscribed on a superb silver of one hundred and twenty ounces weight, as a token of remembrance from the royal guests. On this occasion Her Majesty was habited in dark green covered with silver gauze, and her head-dress appeared spangled with brilliants.

The King's birth-day this year was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence, the circle being enlivened by the presence of the Prince of Mecklenburg, and other foreigners of distinction, among whom the Tripoline ambassador attracted considerable notice. Her Majesty on this day wore a robe of royal purple, entirely covered with Brussels lace of great value; and on no similar occasion was she known to have been so richly dressed; but what heightened the magnificence of her appearance was a bouquet composed solely of brilliants. This was a present recently sent over to the King from the Nizam of the Deccan, and not, as was malevolently reported, an offering made to Her Majesty by that much injured man, the late Mr. Hastings. With this bulse or packet of jewels came over also six pair of crown birds of the most beautiful description; and so very rare, that it was said they cost the prince who sent them a sum little short of four thousand pounds.

The attempt made upon the King's life by an insane woman, named Margaret Nicholson, on the second of August, this year, drew more loyal addresses to the throne than perhaps were ever known upon any former occasion. Fortunately, the Queen was unacquainted with what had happened till informed of it by her royal consort himself. This was owing to an admirable presence of mind in the Marquis del Campo, the Spanish ambassador, who, the moment he heard of the occurrence, went post to Windsor, and obtained an interview of the Queen; not as a man of ordinary sagacity would have done, to assure Her Majesty that the King had received no injury from the knife of the assassin, but solely to engage her in conversation, and thereby to prevent her from hearing any thing of the transaction till the King's arrival. In this design he happily succeeded, and then took leave of their majesties, leaving the King to tell the story himself. His Majesty shook his excellency very heartily by the hand, and assured him that he hardly knew any man in the world to whom he was so much obliged. On the fifteenth of the same month, their majesties, with the three eldest princesses, paid a second visit to Lord and Lady Harcourt at Nuneham, where they arrived about noon, and spent great part of the day in viewing the new improvements carrying on at that delightful seat. The next day, being Sunday, after attending divine service at Nuneham, the King, Queen, and princesses, set out for Oxford, where they arrived about half past one o'clock, and were received by the vice-chancellor, the Duke of Marlborough, and the officers of the University.

who ushered them into the divinity-school, from whence in grand procession they entered the theatre, where the King took the chancellor's chair, the Queen and the princesses being seated at his right hand. After a voluntary had been played on the organ, the vice-chancellor approached the throne with an address on His Majesty's happy deliverance, to which the King made this reply :

"Such dutiful sentiments on my second visit to this seat of learning, accompanied by affectionate congratulations on the protection of divine Providence, manifested by the failure of the attempt on my life, call forth my warmest thanks. I am not less sensible of your expressions towards the Queen. The University of Oxford may ever depend on my inclination to encourage every branch of science ; as the more my subjects are enlightened, the more they must be attached to the excellent constitution established in this realm."

This unpremeditated reply, uttered in a very feeling and impressive manner, had a sensible effect upon all who heard it ; and indeed it must have satisfied every one that the mind from whence such expressions flowed could be of no ordinary character.

On leaving the theatre, the royal party went to take a second view of the New College and its beautiful windows ; after which they visited Wadham and Trinity Colleges, at which last they partook leave of Jenheim for Nuneham. The party then returned to the house, where they spent some time in examining the observatory, with its ample apparatus, and then the party then returned to the excellence of his taste. The party then returned to the compliments from his august visitors on the excellents recently made by the duke, who received many where they spent some time in admiring the improvements, they alighted near the cascade, round the park, and having surveyed it at the most ment of national gratitude; after which they drove view the principal apartments of that noble monastery. Their majesties proceeded from thence to side to a splendid collation prepared for them in the great hall, saloon, and suite of rooms on the west grand entrance, and conducted them through the the arrival of the royal visitors on the steps of the The duke and duchess, with their family, awaited of eleven cannon, on the side of the Great Lake. park from Woodstock were saluted with the firing visit at Blenheim; and on their entrance into the ties honoured the Duke of Marlborough with a about six o'clock. The next morning their majesties the royal party returned to Nuneham to dinner, inspecting the library and pictures at Christ Church, receive the corporation with their address. After and next to the council chamber of the city, to thence they went to Lincoln and Brasenose Colleges, took of an elegant collation in the hall. From

"On the thirty-first of October, the Princess Amelia died at her house in Cavendish Square, in the seventy-sixth year of her age. She was the second daughter and last surviving issue of George the Second, and his Queen Caroline. Her royal highness was born on the tenth of June, 1711, was never married, and had lived many years in rather a private manner. She had a singular presentiment that she should die in October, it being the month that her father died: and it was not a little remarkable that her favourite brother, the Duke of Cumberland, should be carried off by an apoplectic stroke on the very same day of the month. In the evening of the eleventh of November, her remains were privately interred in the royal vault in Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster."

The attention of the public about this time being much excited by the success of Sunday schools, Her Majesty, who was ever ready to encourage all practicable plans for the improvement of the rising generation, expressed a desire to learn some particulars on the subject from Mr. Raikes, the founder of those institutions. That gentleman accordingly waited upon the Queen at Windsor, and in a long conference developed the whole of the system, with an account of the manner in which it originated. Her Majesty was much interested in the explanation; and at the conclusion observed that she envied those who had the power of doing good, by thus personally promoting the welfare of society, in giving instruction to the general mass.

Conformably to this benevolent and exalted sentiment, when Her Majesty was informed that Mrs. Trimmer of Brentford, had laboured with great success in the establishment of Sunday schools, and schools of industry, she signified her wish to see that excellent woman, who in her Diary thus notes the circumstance: "November the nineteenth, 1786. I have this day had the unexpected honour of attending Her Majesty, and had inexpressible pleasure in her sensible, humane, and truly Christian conversation. May her pious design of establishing Sunday schools at Windsor be put in execution!"

Among other particulars in this edifying conversation, the Queen took notice of the want of some practical book on the proper method of distributing and regulating charity. Her Majesty discourages on the duty of benevolence and almsgiving, she observed, were sufficiently numerous; but persons disposed to do good were at a loss for directions how to carry their intentions into effect, in the most satisfactory manner, without the danger of suffering by imposition. The result of this discourse was a desire that Mrs. Trimmer would publish a work on this expressive subject; with which she readily complied, and of which she afterwards gave this account, in a letter to one of her friends :

“ As you express your approbation of the Economy of Charity, I will give you a little history of the occasion of my writing it. Sometime in the last autumn I received a message from the Queen, desiring me to attend her at a certain hour; and I accordingly waited on Her Majesty, who received me with the most condescending kindness, and told me she had heard of the success of the schools under my inspection; and being very anxious for their establishment at Windsor, desired to have information from me on the subject. I was honoured with a conference of two hours. It is impossible to do justice to the charming manner in which the Queen expressed the most benevolent sentiments, and the tenderest regard for the happiness of the poor. My Economy was written in consequence of this interview, and I was allowed to dedicate it to Her Majesty.”

Mrs. Trimmer's correspondent says in her answer, “ Your favour rejoiced my heart, for I look on Her Majesty's sending for you as a most happy circumstance. Your abilities, the excellency of your heart, and your zeal for promoting virtue, are such that no one could be more judiciously chosen. I hope in God our beloved Queen will be the patroness of the Sunday schools: it is an event most devoutly to be wished: her example will cause them to be universal : they will soon be extended over the whole kingdom."

This good lady's wish was accomplished ; for the Queen not only gave her name and sanction to these institutions, but she took a lively concern in them ; and it rejoiced her much that she had found a woman so eminently qualified to assist her benevolent intentions as Mrs. Trimmer was in every respect.

The following letter to a lady, who enjoyed the particular confidence of Her Majesty, shews how sensible Mrs. Trimmer was of the honour conferred upon her, and with what ardour she laboured to turn it most effectually into the means of promoting the welfare of her fellow creatures :

" I return you many thanks," says she, " for your kind attentions in sending to Mr. Gainsborough's the ticket which Her Majesty had the goodness to give me for the abbey. I was very fortunate in being seated agreeably to my wishes ; and need not tell you that the entertainment far exceeded the highest idea I had been able to form of it. I feel myself particularly happy in the honour Her Majesty does me, in desiring to have the plan of our Brentford schools adopted at Windsor. Every day's experience convinces me more and more of the great national benefits which may be expected to arise from this mode of giving religious instruction to the poor ; and as Her Majesty has graciously condescended to become a patroness to the institution, in the place of her own immediate residence, it would be a public misfortune should it fail there, though I want of vigilance in the conductors of it; the only circumstance, I think, that can render it ineffectual. Whenever it is convenient for you, Madam, I shall be happy to see you; and if you can point out any way in which my humble services may be useful in promoting the accomplishment of Her Majesty's benevolent wish for the success of the Windsor schools, I shall gladly embrace the opportunity of exerting them. I have the happiness to see the powerful efficacy of royal example, in the flattering attention paid to my Economy of Charity. Numerous applications have been made since the publication of it, by ladies who are blessed with the means of doing good, for information respecting the plans proposed in it; and as far as I have had an opportunity of observing, a general joy prevails among the conductors of Sunday schools, that Her Majesty deigns to give an additional proof of her tender compassion for the lowest of the people, by noticing the institution."

The school of industry formed by Mrs. Trimmer at Brentford, about this time, gave great pleasure to their majesties, who visited it in person, and behaved in the kindest manner to the children. This charity, as its name imported, combined the two great objects of religious instruction and useful employment; the latter consisting chiefly of spinning flax with a wheel upon a new construction, the mechanism of which was narrowly inspected, and much admired by the King.

Of the excellence of the principle on which the royal acts of benevolence were regulated, a very striking evidence appeared in the dresses worn at court on new year's day, 1787, by Her Majesty and the two elder princesses: the lace and materials being the entire manufacture of the female establishment, supported at the sole expense of the Queen, for bringing up in an accomplished manner the daughters of poor clergymen and decayed tradesmen. It should be here added that besides this, and a number of other schools, Her Majesty instituted another about this time at Windsor, for the maintenance of upwards of twenty girls, who on Easter Sunday received new clothing and presents according to the progress which they had made, and the character they bore upon examination. The object of this seminary was to train up young females as household servants in good families.

Thus did the Queen regulate all her charities with discretion, and direct them on a steady plan of utility for the benefit of the public, as well as of the individuals who were assisted and supported by her bounty.

The charge of the archangel to the prophet of the human race seems to have been ever in her mind :

—Only add

Deeds to thy knowledge answering; add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance; add love,
By name to come call'd CHARITY, the soul
Of all the rest; then wilt thou not be loth
To leave this Paradise, but shalt possess
A Paradise within thee happier far.

The Queen continued to hold Mrs. Trimmer in great esteem through life, on account of her talents, and the use which she made of them; but the partiality was increased perhaps by the circumstance that the father of this accomplished woman, the late Mr. Joshua Kirby, had the honour of teaching both their majesties the art of drawing in perspective; and it should be mentioned also, that he was the means of introducing Gainsborough to the royal patronage, which that excellent artist ever remembered with gratitude; and just before his death he made it his request to be buried in Kew church-yard, near the grave of his friend.

Gainsborough appears to have been the favourite painter of Her Majesty, for whom he executed an admirable whole-length of the King; he painted also most of the princes and princesses. The last commission which he received from the Queen was for a portrait of the Duke of York; and this marked attention Gainsborough always dwelt upon with great delight and exultation.

On the twenty-sixth of June, this year, their majesties, accompanied by the three elder princesses, and the Dukes of Montagu and Ancaster, went to view the porter-brewery of Mr. Whitbread in Chiswell Street. They were received at the door by Mr. Whitbread and his daughter; when, after politely declining the breakfast that had been provided, they immediately went over the buildings. The steam-engine took up their attention above half-an-hour, during which time the King explained the leading movements of the machinery in a manner that clearly shewed his scientific knowledge. The stone cistern raised such wonder, that the Queen and princesses would needs go into it, though with some difficulty, as the aperture was very small; but the sight abundantly rewarded them for their trouble, the vessel being of such capacity as to hold four thousand barrels of beer.

After minutely viewing every part of the premises, they retired to the dwelling-house, and partook of a handsome cold collation, on a service of plate. The board was furnished with every kind of wine; and there was that, without which the reglement would not have been complete, old porter poured from a bottle of extraordinary size. At two o'clock the royal party left Chiswell Street, highly gratified with their reception, and the plain, hospitable manner of Mr. Whitbread, who was no less delighted with the affability and condescension of his illustrious visitors.

A very novel and agreeable entertainment took place a few days after this, at the Queen's house, where, in the great cartoon chamber, Mr. John Kemble and his sister read the whole of the comedy of the Jealous Wife, in the presence of their majesties, and a select party of the nobility; Mrs. Siddons taking the parts of Mrs. Oakley, Major Oakley, Harriet, Russet, and Lord Trimket; her brother reading Mr. Oakley, Paris, and John. The reading commenced about nine o'clock, and ended a little before twelve; but, during the acts, the company took refreshments, which were laid out abundantly in the adjoining rooms.

It should be observed, that at this period there was an extraordinary rage for private theatricals, and many persons of distinction were ambitious of the sock and buskin. Several domestic theatres were erected, where these amateurs of the drama displayed their histrionic talents to brilliant assemblages of applauding friends. Among the nobility, who patronized this fashionable species of amusement, the late Duke of Richmond was by far the most prominent and spirited; and his house may truly be said to have been completely crowded through the season. Their majesties, with five princesses, honoured this theatre with their presence more than once; the first time to see Albany's comedy of the Way to Keep Him, and the last Mrs. Centlivre's lively play of the Wonder. At the former exhibition, an appropriate prologue and epilogue were spoken, the latter written by General Burgoyne, and delivered by the Honorable Mrs. Damer, concluded with the following allusive lines :

Such are the gifts th' attentive loves should bring;
A hoop of gems to guard the bridal ring.
Need I here point to virtues more sublime;
Unchang'd by fashion, unimpair'd by time;
To higher duties of conjugal ties,
To mutual blessings that from duties rise;
Your looks, your hearts, the bright assemblage own,
Which Heav'n to cumulative life has shown,
And plac'd in double lustre on a throne.

This year was rendered remarkable by the commencement of the trial of Warren Hastings; at the opening of which, the Queen, in a very plain dress, accompanied by the princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, and Mary, appeared in the gallery of the Duke of Newcastle. It was indeed a spectacle worthy of the royal curiosity, as well for the splendour of the scene itself, as for the combination of talents which it called forth; and yet who is there that now looks back upon this pompous exhibition with any other feelings than those of admiration at a sight pronounced by the ancient moralist as the sublimest in the world—that of a good man struggling with adversity.

Through life, the King had enjoyed an almost uninterrupted state of good health, owing to habitual regularity and exercise; but in the middle of the summer, this year, he began to complain of indigestion and bilious symptoms, for which he was advised to try the waters of Cheltenham. Accordingly, Bayshill Lodge, built for the late Earl of Fauconberg, was taken for their majesties, who, on the twelfth of July, with the Princess-Royal, Princess Augusta, and Princess Elizabeth, set out from Windsor, a quarter before seven in the morning, and proceeded to Lord Harcourt's seat in Oxfordshire, where they staid about two hours, and then continued their journey to Cheltenham, which place they reached a little before five in the afternoon. The next day being Sunday, the royal family attended divine service at the parish church, where a sermon was preached by Dr. Samuel Hallifax, Bishop of Gloucester. On the following morning, about six o'clock, the King was upon the walks at Cheltenham, and drank the water; which early hour was his daily custom during his stay; and after breakfast he rode out with the Queen and princesses, making excursions round the country, but generally appearing again on the walks between six and seven in the evening.

On the sixteenth, after going to the 2nd, the royal visitors, with their suit, set out for Tewkesbury, where they viewed the inside of the church, with what else was worthy of attention, and returned to Cheltenham. As His Majesty rode into Tewkesbury, the people stood upon the walls of the bridge to see him pass; on which the monarch observing the danger of the situation, humbly addressed them in these words: "My good people, I am afraid that some of you may fall. Don't run such hazards for the sake of seeing your king. I will ride as slowly as you please, that you may all see him."

On the nineteenth, their majesties and the princesses went to Cirencester, and from thence to Oakley Grove, the delightful and classical seat of Lord Bathurst, with the beauty of which they were highly pleased.

The city of Gloucester next had the honour of a royal visit, where their majesties and the three princesses were received at the episcopal palace by the bishop, who, attended by the dean and chapter, addressed the King on the occasion, as also did the mayor and corporation, all of whom kissed the King's hand, and were introduced by him to the Queen. Their majesties afterwards visited the cathedral and the dean, where the King entered into a good deal of conversation with the venerable Dr. Josiah Tucker, the dean, who made many aplogies for the unprepared condition of his house, and particularly the library, which was indeed in a ludicrous state of confusion. From thence the royal party returned to the palace; and after waiting a short time for the carriages, returned in the afternoon to Cheltenham.

On the following Tuesday, their majesties and the princesses dined with the Earl of Coventry, who displayed all the hospitality of the ancient nobility in the reception of his illustrious guests; for, besides the splendid entertainment within the house, he caused the cellar doors to be thrown open to regale the immense multitudes that were assembled on the outside.

At an early hour, on the second of August, the King and Queen rode to Hartlebury Castle, the episcopal residence of Bishop Hurd, with whom they breakfasted; after which, they walked through the grounds, and remained for some time upon the terrace, to gratify the numerous spectators who flocked thither from all parts of the country. On the fifth, their majesties again visited the bishop at his palace in the city, for the purpose of attending the musical meeting of the three choirs of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford. The next morning the King received the clergy in the great hall, when the bishop, after addressing His Majesty, made a complimentary speech to the Queen, who replied in a very gracious manner; after which, the immediately drank "prosperity to the corporation tain being then served by the mayor, His Majesty occasion, I will venture." A glass of rich old moun- wine before dinner in my life, yet upon this pleasing replied : "I do not recollect ever drinking a glass of would be pleased to take a jelly, when His Majesty did not before dinner, the mayor asked him if he As it was known that the King never took any food, where an elegant cold collation was provided. rious, His Majesty was shewn into the grand par- ing the pictures, the regalia and every thing cur- the mayor carrying the sword of state. After view- ing the way, the maces borne by the aldermen, and place; the various trades with their streamers lead- assented, and a grand procession accordingly took the town hall, to which His Majesty graciously request that he would honour them with a visit at Coventry, as the recorder, waited on the King, to Friday morning, the corporation, conducted by Lord music of Handel was most ably performed. On present at the cathedral, when a selection from the Thursday morning the royal family were again clergy, and magistrates, being disposed on each side, justices sat upon an occasional throne, the nobility, Dean, and the Coronation Anthem. Their ma- the overture in Esther, Handel's Dettingen Te cathedral service began, in which was introduced they also did that of His Majesty. At eleven the reverend body had the honour to kiss her hand, as and citizens of Worcester." This was no sooner made known to the populace, than a universal shout of acclamation arose, which continued for several minutes. The King then addressing himself to the corporation, asked whether there was any thing that he could oblige them with; upon which, the Earl of Coventry, in his capacity of recorder, replied on the behalf of his fellow-citizens, "that they tendered their sincere and grateful thanks for the honour His Majesty had done the city of Worcester; and that if he would be graciously pleased to sit for his picture, to be placed in their hall, he would gratify their highest wishes." To this the King answered, "Certainly, gentlemen, I cannot hesitate to grant you that favour, or any other which you can reasonably expect."

The picture was accordingly sent, and two others, one of the King, and the other of the Queen, as presents to the bishop, by whom they were placed in the great drawing-room of the episcopal palace, with a commemorative inscription, written by his lordship.

The visit to the corporation being ended, the royal family again repaired to the cathedral, where the Messiah was performed, which concluded the musical festival; and in the evening there was a grand miscellaneous concert, which the royal visitors honoured with their presence. The next morning their majesties and the princesses left Worcester; and at going away, the Queen put fifty pounds into the hands of the bishop for the poor of the city, in addition to the same sum from the King, who also gave three hundred pounds towards releasing the debtors in the city and county jails.

Early on Thursday morning, the sixteenth, their majesties left Cheltenham, to visit Lord Ducie and Sir George Paul, of which previous intimation had been given. They passed through Painswick about half after eight, and arrived at Stroud between nine and ten. Every testimony of attachment that a well-affected people could show was evinced on this joyful occasion; and a very respectable party of gentlemen conducted the royal visitors through the clothing district, exerting themselves in exhibiting the objects peculiar to this part of the county. After a most condescending attention to the whole process of the woollen manufacture, their majesties and the princesses partook of a déjeuner at Hill House, and then proceeded to Spring Park, the seat of Lord Ducie, where they were entertained with a cold collation.

On Friday evening, which was the last their majesties spent at Cheltenham, they honoured the theatre with a visit, and received the gratulations of the audience with the utmost courtesy. Early the next morning they took leave of the town, which had been enlivened by their presence; and where, during their stay, they engaged themselves to all ranks of people by their condescension and goodness. When the King first went thither, he was asked what guards should accompany him, which question he answered by saying, "I shall take none; can I have better guards than my people?"

One morning, when His Majesty was taking his usual walk alone, after drinking the water, he met a farmer in a great hurry. "So, friend," said the King, "you seem to be very warm."—"Yes, Sir," said the man, "I came a long way; for I want to see the King."—"Well, my friend," observed His Majesty, "here is something to refresh you after your journey," giving him half a guinea. "But where, worthy Sir," said the man, "can I see the King?"—"Friend," replied the monarch, "you see him before you."

CHAPTER XV.

Day.—Singular Occurrence in the Ball Room. of the French and Spanish Ambassadors.—King's Birth-cession to St. Pauls.—Princess-Royal's Fête.—Galas at Windsor.—Visit to Covent-Garden Theatre.—Pro-
 —Anecdotes of Mr. Justice Hargrave.—Queen's Gala Poem.—Drawing-Room.—Conduct of Bishop Watson.
 —Address to Her Majesty.—Illuminations.—Cooper's of the Queen.—Her Fortitude.—Recovery of the King.
 cussions in Parliament on the Regency.—Various Cure other Physicians.—Resentment of Dr. Warren.—Dis-is entrusted to the Care of Dr. Willis.—Jealousy of the illness of the King.—His Majesty removed to Kew.—He tions were suspended.

 into gloom on its being known that the royal func-ment of His Majesty's health was soon converted The joy occasioned by the apparent improve-very numerous. In the evening of that day, the fourth of the same month, when the court was again prevent him from attending a levee on the twenty-other complaints of a bilious kind, but not so as to October His Majesty was attacked with fever and appearances were fallacious, and in the middle of tulations on the amended state of the King; but crowded by the nobility, who offered their congrawas held at St. James's, which was very much

 On the twenty-first of August, a drawing-room

King returned to Windsor, where the malady increased to such an alarming degree, that at the beginning of November Sir George Baker found it necessary to call in Dr. Warren, and Mr. Battist-combe, of Windsor; the latter at the express desire of His Majesty himself. On the arrival of Dr. Warren at the Queen's Lodge, he found Dr. He-borden there, who, as residing near Windsor, had been invited to the consultation by Her Majesty, with whom that excellent physician was always a great favourite. The result of this meeting was the application of a blister to the head of the royal patient, who as yet retained the possession of his senses, though he complained much of an intoler-able oppression on the brain. In spite of bleeding, topical applications, and James's powders, the fever continued with unabated violence, and delirium naturally ensued. Towards the end of the month, however, advantage was taken of a temporary calm-ness to remove His Majesty from Windsor to Kew, which journey he bore extremely well; but the disorder remained the same, or at least with very little abatement. By this time it was deemed necessary to procure additional medical assistance; and among the rest Dr. Francis Willis, of Streteford, near Grantham, in Lincolnshire, whose celebrity in the treatment of mental diseases induced the Lord Chancellor Thurlow to recommend him to Her Ma-jesty. The doctor was a clergyman, and rector of St. John's, Wapping, which living he obtained as an option, in right of his fellowship, from Brasenose College, Oxford. Previous to this, he resided on a small demesne in Lincolnshire, where, having a turn for physic, he was enabled to be of service to his parishioners. The success of his practice, particularly in disorders of the brain, increased the number of his patients, which roused the jealousy of the faculty to such a pitch, that they threatened him with a prosecution. Indignant at such unworthy usage, he proceeded to his bachelor's degree in physic at Oxford, and thus became more than a match for the Scotch doctors, who envied his reputation. After this, he took a large mansion for the reception of lunatics; and many, who had been pronounced incurable by men of eminence, were by his treatment restored to reason and their friends.

But though Dr. Willis was neither an obscure nor an empirical practitioner, his appointment in the present instance excited much jealousy in some of the royal physicians, particularly Dr. Warren, who could not even conceal his resentment within moderate bounds. The difference in their opinions respecting the disorder of the King, and its probable duration, tended to inflame the passions of Dr. Warren, who was naturally of a warm temperment; and when he perceived that the person, whom he looked upon as an intruder, possessed the confidence of the Queen, he became irritated to excess. The reason of this partiality towards Dr. Willis was sufficiently obvious, and amiable, since it arose from the encouragement given by him to Her Majesty's hopes in the assurance which he held out of a speedy recovery; whereas Dr. Warren took a gloomy view of the case, and at last pronounced it absolutely desperate. The rest of the physicians acted with greater caution in the delivery of their judgment, and with more liberality towards Dr. Willis, who, however, found his situation extremely critical and difficult under such peculiar circumstances, and amidst such jealous associates.

In the mean time, the situation of the sovereign came necessarily under the consideration of the two branches of the legislature, where the suspension of the royal functions, and the question of supplying them in the present exigency, occasioned more violence of debate than had ever been known in the English annals since the disputes in the convention parliament on the abdication of the throne by James the Second.

The examination of the physicians was conducted with an inquisitive minuteness, which reflected little credit upon the dignity of a great assembly; and incidental circumstances were thus related, which respect for private feeling and common decorum ought to have concealed. But what moderation was to be expected, when the first of orators, in the vehemence of his passions, could dare, without trembling, to say that the Almighty had been pleased to unite the sovereign with his hand, and that he had hurled him from the throne, and put him in the condition of the meanest peasant in the country?

The language and allusion of this extravagant flight were equally odious and revolting to the sentiments of humanity: but the intemperate zeal manifested to uphold the opinion of Dr. Warren, on the incurableness of His Majesty's complaint, carried with it a far more malign appearance. What was still worse than all the rest attempts were made to create prejudices against the Queen, on account of the confidence which she placed in the judgment of Dr. Willis, preferably to that of his opponent, Dr. Warren, who even went so far as to charge Her Majesty, indirectly, with causing some of the reports to be altered more favourably than the latter would allow. In answer to this Dr. Willis, when examined before the committee of the House of Commons, observed, that Her Majesty had an account of the King's health every hour, and that this statement must of necessity be frequently more favourable than the St. James's account, which was only taken in a morning, when the symptoms always appeared the worst; therefore, he considered this last to be less favourable than strictly true.

Dr. Warren, who evinced through the whole of this melancholy affair a most tenacious adhesiveness to his first opinion, next found fault with

Dr. Willis, for having introduced the Queen, and some of the royal children to His Majesty, which had produced a considerable emotion, though the interview was but short. The answer to this was as follows : " I am very sure that such occurrences can scarce be too frequent, as it comforts the patient to think he is with his family, and that they are affectionate to him : and upon enquiries of patients who have been cured of the same indisposition, they have always mentioned those occurrences as having given them the greatest comfort, and, as they thought, helped very much towards a recovery." Dr. Willis went on to describe the meeting of His Majesty with the Queen and the youngest princess, as extremely moving and affecting. "The King," said he, " shewed the greatest marks of paternal affection for the princess, and of attention to the Queen, with whom he conversed for the space of a quarter of an hour." But though the doctor was present all the time of this interview, he professed himself not a judge whether His Majesty's conversation was disordered at the end or not, as he spoke several sentences in German, but at the conclusion of the meeting, the King took leave of the Queen and princess very properly.

The scandalous reflection upon Her Majesty, for having caused a favourable report to be issued in regard to the improved state of her royal consort, was repelled by Mr. Pitt in very indignant terms :

"If," he observed, "gentlemen inclined to do and any argument on that point, he hoped they would be explicit, and rise superior to any insinuation with respect to a great personage who had been near thirty years amongst us, and on whose character not even slander dared attempt to stain."

Into the history of the proceedings that place on the subject of the Regency, it is unnecessary to enter any further than as they immediately concerned. Amidst all the however, which the agitation of that sure produced, an universal testimony the meritorious conduct of Her Majesty the proposition for entrusting the direction of the household to the king's person, assisted by warm resistance, no one any imputation upon (Earl) Grey, while he vesting these powers every panegyric on virtues," he said, "particularly, and who she had

It will be a great consolation to me to receive the aid of a council, of which I shall stand so much in need, in discharge of a duty wherein the happiness of my future life is, indeed, deeply interested, but which, a higher object, the happiness of a great, loyal, and affectionate people, renders still more important."

In the debate on the clause relative to the privy purse of His Majesty, much was said about the allowance of sixteen thousand a-year to the Queen for purposes unknown to parliament, which elicited this most satisfactory information, that of this sum twelve thousand pounds were to pay an established list of charities: and the remaining four thousand to enable Her Majesty to continue benefactions to persons who were not on the list, but who had hitherto received the royal bounty to that amount.

Throughout this severe trial, the pious fortitude of Her Majesty continued unshaken, and though she could not but suffer much acute anxiety under the distressing visitation, nothing like impatience or despondency appeared in her deportment.

Many were the nights that she sat up, without taking any sleep at all; and when at length she was persuaded to retire to rest, her slumbers were short and disturbed by solicitous enquiries about her afflicted consort.

In the day, the Queen was not less troubled;

It will be a great consolation to me to receive the aid of a council of which I shall stand so much in need, in discharge of a duty wherein the happiness of my future life is, indeed, deeply interested, but which, a higher object, the happiness of a great, loyal, and affectionate people, renders still more important."

In the debate on the clause relative to the privy purse of His Majesty, much was said about the allowance of sixteen thousand a-year to the Queen for purposes unknown to parliament, which elicited this most satisfactory information, that of this sum twelve thousand pounds were to pay an established list of charities: and the remaining four thousand to enable Her Majesty to continue benefactions to persons who were not on the list, but who had hitherto received the royal bounty to that amount. Throughout this severe trial, the pious fortitude of Her Majesty continued unshaken, and though she could not but suffer much acute anxiety under the distressing visitation, nothing like impatience or despondency appeared in her deportment. Many were the nights that she sat up, without taking any sleep at all; and when at length she was persuaded to retire to rest, her slumbers were short and disturbed, by solicitous enquiries about her afflicted consort.

In the day, the Queen was not less troubled;

adjournment took place; and on the tenth of the following month a message was delivered from His Majesty to both houses of parliament, announcing his perfect recovery. Addresses were in consequence moved to the King, full of loyal sentiments, on this joyful event; and each house sent a message also of congratulation to the Queen, whose conduct had endeared her to the country, and whose exemplary and brilliant virtues were looked up to with the highest respect and admiration by every prince and every court of Europe. Such was the language of the lower house, on addressing Her Majesty, who replied as follows:

“ I thank you for this signal mark of your attention, which affords me the highest satisfaction. The evident marks of anxiety which were shewn by the House of Commons, and by the people at large, during His Majesty's indisposition, were the best solace of my affliction; and the joy and loyalty which have appeared in every rank of His Majesty's subjects on his recovery afford the best proof of the attachment of a loyal, a free, and a generous people to their sovereign.”

It should be observed here, that before His Majesty entered upon the discharge of any public office, he thought it his duty to attend divine wor-

adjournment took place; and on the tenth of the following month a message was delivered from His Majesty to both houses of parliament, announcing his perfect recovery. Addresses were in consequence moved to the King, full of loyal sentiments; on this joyful event; and each house sent a message also of congratulation to the Queen, whose conduct had endeared her to the country, and whose exemplary and brilliant virtues were looked up to with the highest respect and admiration by every prince and every court of Europe. Such was the language of the lower house, on addressing Her Majesty, who replied as follows:

"I thank you for this signal mark of your attention, which affords me the highest satisfaction. The evident marks of anxiety which were shewn by the House of Commons, and by the people at large, during His Majesty's indisposition, were the best solace of my affliction; and the joy and loyalty which have appeared in every rank of His Majesty's subjects on his recovery afford the best proof of the attachment of a loyal, a free, and a generous people to their sovereign."

It should be observed here, that before His Majesty entered upon the discharge of any public office, he thought it his duty to attend divine wor-

as besides the painful concern which she felt for the King, whose condition was reported to her sometimes twice in the hour, she had to attend consultations on the proceedings then going on in parliament. It was impossible in the course of these conferences to keep Her Majesty ignorant of the political conflict to which this melancholy exigency had given rise, and of the strenuous efforts that were making to deprive her of a trust to which she was so eminently entitled. That her sensibility was wounded by these fierce disputes is certain; and the wonder would have been if she had remained indifferent under such ungenerous attempts to destroy her hopes by weakening her influence. Providence, however, rewarded the unremitting care and firmness of Her Majesty, by suddenly withdrawing the heavy cloud that had so long eclipsed her comfort. Just as the regency bill approached its last stage, the mind of the King emerged from the obscurity in which it had been for three months involved, and he awoke, as it were out of a dream, to the full possession of his faculties.

"I have been in a strange delirium for some days," said the King; and on being answered that the period was much longer, he paused, raised his eyes in thankfulness to Heaven, and said no more on the subject. This happy posture of the royal mind was stated to the House of Lords by the chancellor, on the twenty-fourth of February, when an adjournment took place; and on the tenth of the following month a message was delivered from His Majesty to both-houses of parliament, announcing his perfect recovery. Addresses were in consequence moved to the King, full of loyal sentiments; on this joyful event; and each house sent a message also of congratulation to the Queen, whose conduct had endeared her to the country, and whose exemplary and brilliant virtues were looked up to with the highest respect and admiration by every prince and every court of Europe. Such was the language of the lower house, on addressing Her Majesty, who replied as follows:

"I thank you for this signal mark of your attention, which affords me the highest satisfaction. The evident marks of anxiety which were shewn by the House of Commons, and by the people at large, during His Majesty's indisposition, were the best solace of my affliction; and the joy and loyalty which have appeared in every rank of His Majesty's subjects on his recovery afford the best proof of the attachment of a loyal, a free, and a generous people to their sovereign."

It should be observed here, that before His Majesty entered upon the discharge of any public office, he thought it his duty to attend divine wor-

as besides the painful concern which she felt for the King, whose condition was reported to her sometimes twice in the hour, she had to attend consultations on the proceedings then going on in parliament. It was impossible in the course of these conferences to keep Her Majesty ignorant of the political conflict to which this melancholy exigency had given rise, and of the strenuous efforts that were making to deprive her of a trust to which she was so eminently entitled. That her sensibility was wounded by these fierce disputes is certain; and the wonder would have been if she had remained indifferent under such ungenerous attempts to destroy her hopes by weakening her influence. Providence, however, rewarded the unremitting care and firmness of Her Majesty, by suddenly withdrawing the heavy cloud that had so long eclipsed her comfort. Just as the regency bill approached its last stage, the mind of the King emerged from the obscurity in which it had been for three months involved, and he awoke, as it were out of a dream, to the full possession of his faculties.

"I have been in a strange-delirium for some days," said the King; and on being answered that the period was much longer, he paused, raised his eyes in thankfulness to Heaven, and said no more on the subject. This happy posture of the royal mind was stated to the House of Lords by the chancellor, on the twenty-fourth of February, when an

Government took place; and on the tenth of the following month a message was delivered from His Majesty to both-houses of parliament, announcing his perfect recovery. Addresses were in consequence moved to the King, full of loyal sentiments, on this joyful event; and each house sent a message also of congratulation to the Queen, whose conduct had endeared her to the country, and whose exemplary and brilliant virtues were looked up to with the highest respect and admiration by every prince and every court of Europe. Such was the language of the lower house, on addressing Her Majesty, who replied as follows:

“ I thank you for this signal mark of your attention, which affords me the highest satisfaction. The evident marks of anxiety which were shewn by the House of Commons, and by the people at large, during His Majesty's indisposition, were the best solace of my affliction; and the joy and loyalty which have appeared in every rank of His Majesty's subjects on his recovery afford the best proof of the attachment of a loyal, a free, and a generous people to their sovereign.”

It should be observed here, that before His Majesty entered upon the discharge of any public office, he thought it his duty to attend divine worship in the private chapel at Kew ; after which, the King, Queen, and three elder princesses, received the holy sacrament, with truly thankful hearts. Never did this, or perhaps any other nation, manifest such enthusiastic transports of joy as were displayed spontaneously on the restoration of the monarch to the exercise of the royal functions, and the bosom of his family. The illuminations in and about the metropolis, for several nights, particularly that of the seventeenth of March, surpassed all description. Every square, street, and alley, exhibited testimonies of loyal affection, in a blaze of splendour ; while to heighten the spectacle, a throng of carriages, and foot-passengers paraded the streets all night long. The palace at Kew, was illuminated in a very elegant manner, under the particular direction of Her Majesty. Against the wall opposite the front of the house, was a most splendid arrangement of variegated lamps ; in the centre of which spectacle was a large transparency, representing Esculapius, holding up towards Heaven a medallion of the King, on whose head Providence, in a female form, appeared in the act of dropping a laurel, while Britannia, kneeling, seemed eager to receive the march, with a countenance expressive of gratitude. Over the picture was a pediment of lamps, surmounted by a crown, having beneath it this inscription : “ G. III. the beloved father of his people.”

Under all were the following lines :

The best of fathers, husbands, and of men ;
 In those permitted to embrace again
 The change to transport from the depths of woe,
 If such the general joy, what words can show
 All Europe hails the friend of human kind.
 But not to Britain is the bliss confin'd ;
 A patriot king to bless Britannia's shores ;
 Our prayers are heard, and Providence restores

On each side of the picture was a plaster of lamps, and at each gate an arch of lamps, with festoons and coronets of the same, between the arches and pillars, forming a tasteful display of light.

The King on that day dined at Windsor, where the joy of the people was unbounded on beholding him once more among them ; but Her Majesty and the three elder princesses remained at Kew, from whence, in the evening, they proceeded to the house of Lord Bathurst in Piccadilly, for the purpose of seeing the illuminations. Having taken some refreshment, the royal party set off in a coach belonging to one of the ladies of the household, for the city ; and after driving through the principal streets and squares for about three hours, they returned to Kew, where, to their great surprise, though it was two o'clock in the morning, the King appeared to open the door of the carriage, and to receive from them the account of their entertainment. Of this excursion, Cowper wrote a poetical description, which, though not equal to his other works, merits insertion in this place.

When long sequestered from his throne,

GEORGE took his seat again,

By right of worth, not blood alone,

Entitled here to reign ;

Then Loyalty, with all his lamps

New trimm'd, a gallant show !

Chasing the darkness and the damps,

Set London in a glow.

'Twas hard to tell of streets, or squares,

Which form'd the chief display ;

The most resembling cluster'd stars,

Those the long milky way.

Bright shone the roofs, the domes, the spires,

And rockets flew self driven,

To hang their momentary fires

Amid the vault of heaven.

Had all the pagans of the world

In one procession join'd,

And all the banners been unfurl'd

That heralds e'er design'd ;

For no such sight had England's Queen

Forsoaken her retreat,

Where GEORGE recover'd made a scene

Sweet, always doubly sweet.

Yet glad she came that night, to prove

A witness undescried,

How much the object of her love

Was lov'd by ALL beside.

Save love of George alone,
 To raise such wonder in a view,
 Had been exerted none,
 But other magic there she knew Quoted and sustained.
 And seem'd by some magician's art
 Like those in fable feign'd,
 It was a scene in every part George ever drew from her.
 None else, except in prayer for him,
 But with a joyful tear;
 Soon wary grew her eyes and dim,
 The night his city fell.
 Which shook Belshazzar at his wine
 So difficult to spell,
 Unlike the errors of that line
 And George the theme of all:
 Emblems of health, and heavenly aid,
 On many a splendid wall,
 Pleas'd, she beheld aloft portray'd,
 Had known their Sovereign come.
 As all by instinct, like the bees,
 And hears the million hum, Arriv'd, a night like noon she sees,
 That night, except her own.
 And gratify no curious eyes
 Resolv'd to be unknown,
 On borrow'd wheels away she flies
 To veil a deed of mine.
 Darkness oh Queen! ne'er call'd before
 In aid of her design—
 Darkness the skies had wanted o'er

That cordial thought her spirit cheer'd,
 And through the cumbrous throng,
 Not else unworthy to be fear'd, Convey'd her calm and hush,
 So ancient poets say, serene,
 The sea-maid rides the waves,
 And, fearless of the billowy scene,
 Her peaceful bosom laves.
 With more than æsthetic eyes
 She view'd the brilliant show ;
 One Georgian Star adorns the skies,
 She myriads found below.
 Yet, let the glories of a night,
 Like that, once seen, suffice ;
 Heaven grant us no such future sight,
 Such previous woe the price !

The first drawing-room held by Her Majesty this year was on the twenty-sixth of March ; and one of equal brilliancy perhaps was never witnessed. It was like the dawning of a beautiful morning in spring, after a dark and tempestuous night. The Queen wore round her neck a medallion, tied with a double row of gold chain, and across her shoulders was another chain of three rows of pearls, and five rows of diamonds, fastened low behind, to which was suspended before a fine miniature of the King, studded with diamonds. In the front of Her Majesty's hair the words "God save the King" were set in a rich cluster of diamonds. All the princesses and ladies present had some allusive devices and mottoes of similar import. Her Majesty sat in a chair of state, under a canopy very richly laced; but it was observed, or fancied, that in the reception of the company she appeared to make a distinction according to the part the visitors had respectively taken in the late crisis.

That the Queen felt agitated in the presence of men who had so recently contributed to aggravate her sorrows, may easily be conceived; and it would have indicated either apathy or hypocrisy if she had deported herself without seeming to know the difference between tried friends and time-serving sycophants. Among the latter was Dr. Watson, Bishop of Landaff, who has left in his posthumous publication a most scurrilous invective against the Queen, for having treated him with coolness, amounting to disrespect, when he presented himself at the levee. How far Her Majesty merited censure, or whether in fact she was not perfectly justified in acting as she did, a simple statement of the truth will shew. When the indisposition of the King became known, this restless and ambitious prelate was at Cambridge, watching the issue; but the instant he was informed of the death of Dr. Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph, he posted up to town, and made his appearance in the House of Lords, where he delivered a flaming speech in favour of an unrestricted regency; besides which, he joined in a protest against the powers granted to the Queen and her council. The bishop was the only man of his order who took an active part in this delicate business, for though Dr. Wilson, of Bristol, voted on the same side, he did it silently. The motive of Watson was too obvious to be mistaken; and had the King remained in a state of moral incapacity long enough for the operation of the regency bill, the desired translation would, beyond question, have been the reward of his zeal and officiousness. But his hopes were blasted by the recovery of the King; on which his lordship drew up two addresses for his clergy; one to His Majesty, and the other to the Queen. In the latter were these expressions: "Sensible of the influence of royal example, we have always thought that your majesty was entitled to the thanks of the kingdom for the proofs you have uniformly given, during a long residence amongst us, of the sincerity of your piety, of the amiableness and purity of your manners as a Queen, as a wife, and as a mother. But if your majesty could have claimed our regard on any other account, the tenderness and concern you have shewn for a beloved monarch, during his late unhappy situation, would have secured to you the grateful attachment of a loyal people." Such was the tributary respect paid to the Queen by this bishop on his own behalf, and that of his indeed is it likely that even the bishop, with all his meddling prelate ever thought of attributing the aim, tellus imbellis ictu; for nobody but this and the shaft, envenomed as it was, fell short of its the malice of the man was greater than his power; from motives equally sordid. And yet, after all, wish to make it appear that the Queen also acted him to adopt the course which he did, it was his prospect of higher preferment had alone stimulated mind by his own; and being conscious that the eventful trial. But the bishop measured the royal ciple was which influenced Her Majesty in the late nor in that of any mortal, to know what the prin-worst description, for it was neither in his power, was not only a double dealer; but a slanderer of the Here, then, according to his own declaration, he tion to the minister was an opposition to the King." conducted herself on the principle, "that the opposition was intended as a personal insult to the Queen, who necessity of protecting the rights of the sovereign," there was "no diversity of opinion about the words that the address, in which he foisted the words that was still blacker, for he says, that the conclusion of city; but if his narrative be correct, his conduct account, therefore, he acted with the grossest duplicity; and yet at the time of his presenting it he did not think Her Majesty deserving of the compliments which the address contained. By his own acrimony, believed in his heart what he asserted with his pen. . . That he was capable of such deception, is evident from the contradictions contained in this address, and from the circumstance that he made the whole body of his clergy instrumental to an insult upon their sovereign, without one of them having the least conception of such a design. There was not a single person whose signature stood affixed to this address that would not have thrown the paper back into the face of his diocesan, had the latter honestly explained his meaning instead of cloaking it under phrases liable to impose upon the understanding. But "what will not ambition and revenge descend to?" The bishop, with all the deceivableness of unrighteousness, most carefully concealed the sting with which he intended to wound the feelings of Her Majesty from the knowledge of his flock, who, in the simplicity of their hearts, persuaded themselves that they were honoured by carrying up to the throne, not "the poisonous acorn, which grows unknown, and is when known refused," but a votive offering of joy and gladness worthy of the royal acceptance. Thus it is that

Oh, though Wisdom wake, Suspicion sleeps
At Wisdom's gate, and to Simplicity
Reigns her charge, while Goodness thinks no ill
Where no ill seems.

That the bishop was sorely hurt at his disappointment may readily be supposed, but he had only himself to thank for it; and even if his other claims to advancement had been as just as they were the reverse, the crooked way which he pursued to gain his object rendered him unworthy of it. About three years before this, he had endeavoured to insinuate himself into the royal favour by a fulsome address to the Queen, prefixed to his compilation of Theological Tracts for the use of students in divinity. Perhaps no collection could be more improperly inscribed, for it consisted of a heterogeneous mass of pamphlets, many of them radically hostile to the confession of the established church, and to the religious principles of Her Majesty. But the aim of the bishop was to secure a step towards a translation; and the venerable Lowth being then in a declining state, his lordship of Landaff flattered himself with the hope that a little well-timed adulation would not be unacceptable at court. In this he was completely mistaken, for neither the King nor the Queen could endure addresses of this sort; and the drift of the obsequious prelate was not only seen through by them, but by his old acquaintance, Mr. Pitt, at whose recommendation, aided by Her Majesty, Dr. Porteus was removed from Chester to London.

If it be thought that too much has been said upon this mass of posthumous calumny, let it be considered, that were the assertions of such a man silence would by many be construed into an admission of their truth. The bishop might have gone quietly into his grave, accountable only to his maker for the improvement of his barren lands, and the neglect of his still more barren diocese, had he not left behind him a mine of mischief to lacerate the feelings of the living, and to destroy the reputation of the dead, forgetting in his malignity the observation, that "He whose hatred is covered by deceit, shall have his wickedness shewn before the whole congregation." (Prov. xxvi, 26.) More might have been said, and justly, on the spirit and conduct of the vain-glorious hierophant; but here he shall be left for the present, brooding over his imaginary wrongs, like another Abiathar in the fields of Anathoth.

A more agreeable companion is now to be introduced, with whom the reader cannot fail to be delighted. The late Mr. George Hardinge, one of the Welsh judges, was at that time solicitor-general to the Queen, and a member of the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself with considerable eloquence on the regency question, as his uncle, the great Earl Camden, did in the Lords. Shortly after the recovery of the King, and a little before the grand fête intended to be given by the Queen and the Princess-Royal, on account of that the following interesting narrative :

 justies at Windsor ; of which interview he penned joyful event, Mr. Hardinge waited upon their ma-

“ I arrived at the Queen’s Lodge at twelve, and was carried to the edurety’s room. Colonel Digby came to me, civil, and gentleman-like. He chatted with me for half-an-hour, and when he left me, said, he would let the King know through General Harcourt that I was there. In a few minutes I was gallanted up stairs into Madame Schwellenbergen’s dining-apartment. There I found General Harcourt, who is a very agreeable man. He told me, that when the King (who was going to the castle to receive the address of the clergy) should come out of his apartment, he would let him know, and receive his commands.”

“ In a quarter of an hour two royal coaches came to the door ; and an edurety handed the Queen into the first. The King followed her, without a thought, apparently, of poor me. Princess-Royal and Princess Augusta followed. This filled the first coach. No. 2 had Princess Elizabeth and a bedchamber-woman. Then, a-foot, my friends Digby and Harcourt. When they were frow, the porter came to me, and said, General Harcourt had named me to the King ; but that His Majesty being in a great hurry, had said nothing. That if I pleased, I might wait till His Majesty’s return, which, the

by that name, and said, 'they were the boldest rats he ever knew, for that all the calculation was against them. Even — said It was probable I should recover: not that I am recovered, according to some of them: and yet I have read the last report of the physicians, which is tolerably good proof that I am well. By the way, your uncle is considerably better, and I flatter myself that my getting well has done him good.' I then said, that I had left him in some alarm how he was to wear the Windsor uniform, with a tie wig over it, from the fear that he should be mistaken for an old general, that had fought at the battle of Dettingen. The Queen said, 'Oh! I plead guilty to that; and I see you enjoy it. I said Hardinge will enjoy it; for though he is very good-natured, he loves a little innocent mischief.' The King then told me the whole story of the conference with Pitt; commended the House of Commons, and said, 'his illness had in the end been a perfect bliss only to him, as proving to him how nobly the people would support him when he was confined.' This tempted me to say, that it was no political debate, but the contest between generous humanity and mean cruelty, and it interested human nature. Then we talked of Mrs. Siddons, Jordan, &c. and the Queen said, 'Siddons was going to Germany, to make the English find out by her absence that she was good for something.' Then we flew to Handel; after in a very flattering manner, by causing their arms, gushed the Lord Chancellor Thurlow and Mr. Pitt called the King's friends. Her Majesty distinguished their ladies and families, who were emphatically and consisted chiefly of those of the nobility, with though the company was rather select than numerous, had a grand effect, and the feast was very magnificent. Duke of York. The spectacle in St. George's Hall right by the Prince of Wales, and on the left by the and do the honours of the table, supported on her above two hours longer, to enjoy the festive scene, His Majesty retired; but the Queen remained o'clock, and the latter at one in the morning, when grand supper, the former commencing at eight This entertainment was confined to a concert and general, and admitted of no exception.

The pleasantry to which Her Majesty alluded was occasioned by the notice that all the gentlemen invited to her gala on the second of April were expected to appear in the Windsor uniform; and as a card to that effect had been sent to Lord Camden, he either imagined, or was persuaded by his factious nephew to believe, that the regulation was parted."

door, made a low bow to the females, and de- said, 'I am going to my dinner.' I was near the which the King made me a most gracious bow, and with appropriate devices, to form part of the ornaments on the supper table.

On the fifteenth of April, the Queen, accompanied by the princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, honoured Covent-Garden with their presence, for the first time after the recovery of the King. As soon as Her Majesty entered the box, which she did a minute or two before her daughters, a joyful peal of acclamation burst forth from every part of the house; and the curtain being drawn up at the same instant, displayed a transparency, exhibiting the royal arms, superbly emblazoned, having a scroll above, with the words LONG LIVE THE KING; and another underneath, MAY THE KING LIVE FOR EVER! Two cherubs supported the last, waving wreaths of laurel over it; and the whole painting was richly decorated with a rich foliage of roses and myrtles. The exhibition had a fine effect; and Her Majesty was so much moved by it that she burst into tears; in which emotion her daughters sympathized; and the whole house felt the force of the scene, in a manner that evinced general sensibility. After a short pause, "God save the King" was called for, and sung twice over, the whole audience joining in chorus, and the Queen beating time with her fan. At the conclusion of the play the song was repeated, and again encored; but even this did not lustrate that gladdened the day, and seemed to grace out, about ten o'clock, the sun shone forth with a patience the coming of the King, at whose setting lessly braved the weather, and waited with extreme expectation of the multitude, who, however, fear-down in such a manner as threw a damp upon the the morning was unfavourable, and the rain poured sat up all the preceding night. The beginning of structures were filled with spectators, many of whom way from Pall-Mall to St. Paul's. These temporary fixed against the churches and houses the whole to enter the church; and innumerable others were side of the awning under which their majesties were equal sublimity. Scaffoldings were erected on each the annals of this country witness a spectacle of the twenty-third of April; and never perhaps did ment. The day fixed for this solemn festival was able to the notice sent to both houses of parliament. The day fixed for this solemn festival was of thanksgiving in the metropolitan church, agree-appearance till he had first made his votive offering tion which he had taken of declining any public at the theatre, was occasioned by the pious resolution His Majesty was not present with his happy family than six times in the course of the evening. That their assistance, so that the loyal air was sung no less whole company stood up and sang it twice, without hesitated in complying with the requisition, the once more demanded; and when the performers satisfy the audience, for, after the farce, it was its triumphs. At Temple Bar, the sovereign was met by the lord-mayor, who, after presenting the city sword, and receiving it again, rode on horse-back, bare-headed, before the royal carriage to St. Paul's, where their majesties alighted exactly at noon, the Queen being handed out by her august consort. At their entrance they were struck with the sublime picture of six thousand children of different parishes, so situated as to be seen at one point of view, and saluting their benefactors as they passed with an anthem to the great Creator. This arrangement took place at the express desire of Her Majesty, who was almost overcome with admiration; nor did the King enjoy it less; and, in fact, the whole royal family appeared as if they could have remained on the spot, had not their attention been called to another scene of more splendour. The children continued singing part of the hundredth psalm, until their majesties, the royal family, and their attendants, were seated; and then the service of the day began: after which, the Bishop of London delivered a plain but appropriate sermon from Psalm xxvii, 16.—“O tarry thou the Lord's leisure: be strong, and He shall comfort thine heart: and put thou thy trust in the Lord.”

In this discourse, the right reverend preacher carefully abstained from all political allusions and personal compliment; the only part that had any reference to private feeling being an observation on the firmness of the royal trust in Providence. After the sermon, an anthem, selected by the King himself from the 130th Psalm, was sung by the best voices in the choir, and the whole concluded with the offertory at the altar. As their majesties left the choir, the charity children sang part of the 10th Psalm; and the pleasure which the Queen received from this affecting scene was sufficiently expressed in her countenance. Indeed, the whole congregation partook of the emotion; and it was with difficulty that the congregation suppressed their plaudits. The royal family returned with the same state to the Queen's Palace; greeted as they passed along by the joyful acclamations of the people, who lined the streets and filled the houses. This universal demonstration of loyalty, which afforded an unequivocal proof that His Majesty reigned in the hearts of his subjects, had a very sensible effect upon the royal visitors. The Queen in particular, through the whole of the day, shewed in her countenance and manner an uncommon elation of spirits; but His Majesty was rather placid and serene.

The same day, eighty of the Sunday-school children at Windsor were clothed by Her Majesty, and attended divine service, following the mayor and corporation in procession. All of them wore in their hats a garter blue ribbon, with "Long live the King" in letters of gold; and to every child was given a medal, which was hung round the neck by an orange-coloured ribbon.

A few days previous to the general thanks-giving, the governors of Bethlem Hospital received a seasonable benefaction from a person unknown, accompanied with the following note: "The governors of Bethlem Hospital are desired to apply the inclosed two bank-notes, of fifty pounds each, to the use of that charity, being the humble expression of the donor's gratitude to Almighty God, for that signal act of his mercy to these kingdoms which is to be publicly commemorated on the twenty-third of April, 1789." But though the communication was so managed as to elude discovery of the benevolent source, the general opinion attributed the donation to the highest quarter.

On the twenty-eighth of this month, Her Majesty gave another grand entertainment at Windsor, to those of the nobility and gentry who were not present at the Queen's concert. But the most splendid fête of all was the gala given by the Princess-Royal on the first of May. The cards of invitation were in the name of her royal-highness to the unmarried branches of the nobility, and other persons of distinction; while the married were invited by Lord Aylesbury, in the name of the Queen.

The company, consisting of two hundred and twenty-eight persons, began to assemble about eight o'clock in the ball-room, which by ten was extremely full.

The King wore the Windsor uniform, as also did the gentlemen; and the ladies were dressed in garter blue, covered with white tiffany, which by candle-light gave to the whole an appearance of purity. A large plume of white feathers, either plain or tipped with orange, added grandeur to the head-dress that had a very fine effect. Her Majesty and the princesses did not differ from the general costume; and the whole female circle wore bandeaux with the words "God save the King;" most of the ladies also having rich medallions of the monarch, some set in pearl, and some in diamonds.

The dances did not begin till ten o'clock; their majesties and the princesses being more than an hour intermixed with the company, conversing in the most affable manner with every person present. During the dances, the King and Queen either sat under the canopy, or walked round the room; and about a quarter before one the ball finished, when the company went into St. George's Hall to supper, which exceeded any thing of the kind ever given in this kingdom. There were two long tables, sixty-four feet each; and at the upper end, opposite the centre, a cross one was laid out for thirteen, and raised above the rest, to which the King, with great dignity, led his consort; and then, wishing the company good night, retired.

At the royal table sat the Queen, having on her right the Prince of Wales, the Princess-Royal, the Duke of Gloucester, Princess Elizabeth, and Prince William of Gloucester: on her left, the Duke of York, Princess Augusta, the Duke of Cumberland, Princess Mary, and Princess Sophia of Gloucester. The whole service on Her Majesty's table was gold; and on the ground-works were the figures of peace and plenty, with the olive branch and cornucopie—the accompaniments various, geni weaving wreaths of flowers, and the pedestals representing vases of fruits.

On one of the long tables the platform was covered with dancing figures;—the other had the emblematical ones of Hope, Charity, &c. which being done on sand, glistened with the reflected light of the candles.

That part of the supper which was not consisted of twenty turcens of different soups, roast ducks, turkey-pouts, cygnets, green geese, land-rails, chickens, asparagus, peas, and beans. The cold parts of the collation were the same kind of poultry boned, and swimming or standing in the centre of transparent jellies, where they were supported by paste pillars, not in circumference thicker than a knitting needle. This, with the lights playing from candles, and reflected by the polish of the es and dishes, made a most beautiful appear-Gray-fish pies of all kinds were distributed h great taste; and the hams and brawn in masade, swimming on the surface of pedestals of y, seemingly supported but by the strength of an arent liquid, excited general admiration.

The ornamental parts of the confectionery were h numerous and splendid. There were temples r feet high, in the different stories of which re sweetmeats; the various orders of architece being displayed in the same with exquisite te.

The side tables contained large goblets of gold,
o an entire new service of gold, and silver plates.
The dessert comprehended all that the hot-use could afford, and indeed more than it was ought art could have produced at that season.
ere was a profusion of pines, strawberries, peaches, ectorines, apricots, cherries of every kind, plums,
d raspberries, with the best and richest preserved uits, as well those that are dried as those in syrup.
There were forty silver branches, each holding vo large wax tapers on the long tables, and six gold ranches on the Queen's table; and at the sideords were two magnificent candelabra, which ave a very brilliant light.

The hall, besides, was elegantly illuminated, and in a much superior style to what it had ever before exhibited. The stone gallery on one side was hung with transparencies executed by Rebecca, and on the other with paintings by West, which had a fine effect:

On the twenty-ninth of May, the French ambassador gave a magnificent entertainment to the royal family, and the principal of the nobility, at his house in Portman Square. In the grand saloon, where the Queen was first received, a superb chair was placed, near to which the princesses were seated. After the first ceremonies, a group of dancers from the Opera House came forward, dressed in pastoral habits, and presented to Her Majesty cornucopias of fruit entwined with wreaths of roses, which they laid at Her Majesty's feet. The effect was pretty enough, and reminded the spectator of the pagants of former days. On each side of the saloon was a transparent painting: one representing the genius of France, congratulating that of England on the recovery of the King; an excellent likeness of whom was held by Hygeia; the other painting was a representation of the Graces attending Her Majesty, upon whose head an angel appeared in the act of placing a crown. The dances continued till near one o'clock, when the supper rooms were opened, and displayed a profusion of luxury and magnificence. About nine hundred cards of invitation were given out on this occasion; but by the express desire of Her Majesty no person was present who had not been introduced at court.

Splendid, however, as this entertainment was, that given by the Marquis del Campo, the Spanish ambassador, at Ranelagh, on the second of June, far exceeded it. The whole external front of the house was illuminated in a novel manner; and the portico immediately leading to the rotunda was filled on each side with rows of myrtle, aromatic shrubs, and rose trees, intermixed with carnations and pinks. The rotunda itself, at the first opening to the sight, exhibited a most superb appearance; and the continued lamps spread around had a very striking effect.

The lower boxes formed a Spanish camp, striped blue and red; each tent guarded by a boy dressed in the Spanish uniform. The gallery formed a temple of Flora, lighted by a number of gold baskets, containing wax tapers, ornamented with roses and other flowers.

The Queen's box was hung with crimson satin lined with white, which hung in festoons richly fringed with gold; and at the top was a regal crown.

In the orchestra, which was converted into a magnificent pavilion of white and gold, lined with green embroidered satin, a table of eighteen covers was laid for the royal family;

Opposite to Her Majesty's box was a light temple or stage, on which a Spanish dance was performed by children: at another part were beautiful moving transparencies; and in a third was a lottery of valuable trinkets, consisting of six hundred prizes, according to the number of ladies invited. The greatest prize was an elegant gold watch, richly ornamented with diamonds, which fell to the lot of Miss Sturt. The other prizes consisted of rings, bracelets, fans, necklaces, &c. Her Majesty drew an etwée case with a beautiful medallion of the King;

Women, ornamented with wreaths of flowers, made tea; and one hundred valets in scarlet and gold, and as many footmen in sky blue and silver, waited on the company.

The fire-works in the garden were uncommonly beautiful; and to give additional splendour to the scene, the ambassador caused twenty pleasure-boats, illuminated with lamps, to sail up and down the river, letting off rockets as they passed.

After the dances, the Queen and royal family retired to supper.

The service was entirely of gold; and the decorations were of the most magnificent description, the table-cloth alone having cost ninety guineas. There were all sorts of the choicest wines and fruit, some of which had been sent from Spain purposely for the entertainment.

Her Majesty was handed to the table by his excellency the Spanish ambassador; and there were also present the four eldest princesses, and the Duke of Gloucester, with his son and daughter.

After supper the dances were resumed, and continued till past five in the morning; but the Queen and princesses withdrew about three.

Her Majesty's birth-day this year was kept at Windsor, when the court was thronged with visitors; and in the evening there was a grand concert and supper on a very extensive scale. The King's birth-day was celebrated at St. James's; and the drawing-room was so crowded, that, to prevent confusion, the company passed in at one door and out at the opposite, after making their congratulations. The three younger princesses received the compliments of the visitors in the Queen's apartment.

Her Majesty's dress surpassed in point of richness any that had ever been beheld on a like occasion. The pockets were lined all over, and ornamented with large diamond bows, to each of which there was a chain of brilliants that ran the whole length; and about thirty large diamond buttons and tassels were fastened to the petticoat. Her head-dress was of thread lace, with two feathers profusely ornamented with diamonds. The drawing-room began to clear about five o'clock; and by eight the resort to the ball-room was very general. His Majesty, however, was not present any part of the day, owing to the shock occasioned by the duel lately fought between the Duke of York and Colonel Lenox, in which his royal highness may be said to have had an hair-breadth escape. The Queen had in consequence to go through all the burthen of the ceremonials without support; but an event occurred at the ball in the evening, equally unexpected, disagreeable, and unprecedented. Notwithstanding what had so recently happened, and the established etiquette that no persons should stand up at country-dances who had not previously danced, a minuet, Colonel Lenox appeared in the circle with Lady Catharine Barnard. This the Prince of Wales did not perceive till he and his partner, the Princess-Royal, came to the colonel's place in the dance, when, struck with the impriety, he took the hand of the princess, just as she was about to be turned by the colonel, and led her to the bottom of the dance. The Duke of York and the Princess Augusta came next, and they turned the colonel without the least particularity or exception. The Duke of Clarence with the Princess Elizabeth came next, and his royal highness followed the example of the Prince of Wales. The dance proceeded, however, and Colonel Lenox and his partner danced down: but when they came to the Prince and Princess, his royal highness took his sister, and led her to her chair by the Queen. Her Majesty then addressing herself to the Prince, said, "You seem heated, Sir, and tired." "I am heated and tired, Madam," said the Prince, "not with the dance, but tired of dancing in such company." "Then, Sir," said the Queen, "it will be better for me to withdraw, and put an end to the ball." "It certainly will be so," said the Prince, "for I never will countenance insults given to my family, however they may be treated by others." At the end of the dance, accordingly, Her Majesty and the princesses withdrew, and thus the ball concluded. The Prince, with his natural gallantry, afterwards explained to Lady Catharine Barnard the reason of his conduct, and assured her ladyship that it gave him much pain to be under the necessity of acting in a manner that might subject any lady to a moment's embarrassment.

Though His Majesty was happily restored to mental and bodily health, it was deemed advisable that he should try the benefit of sea-air and bathing, for the complete invigoration of the system after the severe shock which it had sustained. Weymouth was selected for this purpose; and it was the more eligible as the Duke of Gloucester had a lodge there suited for the accommodation of his royal brother and family. Accordingly, about seven in the morning, on the twenty-fifth of June, their majesties and the three eldest princesses left Windsor, and arrived at Lyndhurst a little after three in the afternoon. They were attended by Lady Courtenay,

Their Majesties' Journey to Weymouth.—Arrival at Lyndhurst.—Singular Texture.—Visit to Southampton and Lynton.—Reception at Weymouth.—Anecdote of the King.—Journal of the Royal Progress.—Alyatic Excursions.—Quick's Benefit at the Theatre.—Visit to Lutworth Castle.—Nautical Manœuvres.—Their Majesties' Journey to Plymouth.—Pleasing Spectacle at Milton.—Reception at Exeter.—Saltwater House.—Plymouth.—Dock-Yard.—Accident.—Natal Review.—Victualing-Office.—Mount Edgcumbe.—Excursions on the Tamer.—Royal Donations.—Return to Weymouth.—Dining Service on board Ship.—Milton Abbey.—Departure from Weymouth.—Longleat.—Tottenham Park;—Windsor.

CHAPTER XVI.

the two ladies Waldgrave, Lord Conston, Colonel Goldsworthy, and Colonel Gwynn; and were followed in about an hour by the Duke of Gloucester and his suite. At Winchester and Romey their majesties were received as they passed with cordial acclamations of joy; and an immense number of horsemen, who joined the royal travellers on the road, proceeded with them to the end of their journey. At the extremity of the New Forest they were met by the lord warden and his deputy, the steward, bailiff, vergers, reguards, royal and other bowmen, agisters, and the various officers of the forest, in their ancient uniforms, who preceded the royal carriages to Lynchhurst; where, upon His Majesty's alighting in the court-yard of the King's House, he was presented by the Rev. Sir Charles Mill, baronet, hereditary bailiff of the forest, with a brace of milk-white greyhounds, having gold collars, and coupled with a green silk ribbon, agreeable to the ancient custom of the Manor of Colerberry, which obliges him to make such presentment to every crowned head whenever he enters the forest.

At Lynchhurst the royal family dined in a room exposed to public view; after which they threw the windows open, and joined the populace in the choruses of "God save the King," and "Rule Britannia." In the evening they condescended to gratify the loyal wishes of the people, by walking through the village, attended by all their train, while the happy rustics around cheered them with loud acclamations.

The next morning their majesties honoured Southampton with a visit, and were received in the audit-room by the mayor and corporation, who, by their town clerk, presented an address, which was very graciously received. After partaking of refreshments, the royal party went to the quay, and from thence walked round the platform, where they expressed much pleasure with the grandeur of the views, the richness of which was considerably heightened by a full tide. They then proceeded in their carriages round the beach; and after honouring Colonel Haywood with a call, and taking chocolate, returned much gratified with their excursion to Lyndhurst.

On Saturday their majesties and the princesses visited the town of Lyminster, where also they were received with every demonstration of joy, and at night the place was splendidly illuminated.

The following morning they heard divine service, and a sermon preached by one of the Duke of Gloucester's chaplains, in the chapel belonging to the Lodge. Early on Monday, the whole of the royal family departed from Lyndhurst, and in the afternoon passed through Salisbury, where a triumphal arch, ornamented with festoons of flowers and laurel wreaths, was erected, under

On Wednesday morning the King rode out for had all the honour to kiss their majesties, hands.

was most graciously received; and the gentlemen upon the King and Queen with an address, which The next day the mayor and corporation waited with and jollity.

by the enraptured inhabitants of Weymouth in the town was also illuminated, and the night spent evening there was a splendid display of fire-works; well-guarded by his affectionate people. In the his attention, but said he found himself sufficiently sions, the benevolent monarch thanked him for vide constables to attend the King in his excursion of people; and when the mayor offered to pro-two hours, surrounded by an incredible concourse After dinner they walked on the sands for he said, "I never enjoyed a sight so pleasing."

the beauty of the scene, that, turning to the Queen, viewing the bay of Weymouth, was so struck with by the battery on the esplanade. His Majesty, on was fired from the ships in the road, and answered Gloucester Lodge, a royal salute of twenty-one guns
'God save the King.' When the King reached with colours flying, and a band of music playing men, and common-council, walking in procession, at the entrance of the town by the mayor, alderarrived at Weymouth. Their majesties were met ing; and the same afternoon, about four o'clock, which the entire cavalcade proceeded without stop-

two hours along the coast, towards Lulworth Castle; and, in the evening he was present with the Queen and princesses at a haul of fish upon the beach; after which, the whole party went and drank tea with Lady Sydney.

At a very early hour on Friday the King perambulated the beach by himself for a considerable time; and after dinner the whole royal family appeared on the sands, conversing freely with several persons, and evidently desirous of communicating happiness to all around them. The weather being rainy on Saturday, their majesties did not venture out, but diverted themselves at home with literary conversation; and in the evening they had a select party at cards. On Sunday morning, between seven and eight, the King was on the esplanade, where he walked two hours unattended; and after breakfast proceeded with all his family on foot to church, at the door of which they were met by the mayor and corporation, who conducted them to their respective pews; that of the King and Queen, in the centre aisle, being fitted up with green silk curtains. A psalm at the opening of the service, and an anthem at the conclusion, were performed by some of the best voices in the neighbourhood. The sermon was preached by the Reverend Mr. Thomas Groves, the rector of Weymouth. After divine service their majesties and the princesses walked till dinner on the beach, to shew themselves to the immense crowds of affectionate subjects whom curiosity had assembled from the most distant parts of the country.

The King did not bathe in the sea for some days after his arrival, owing to the unsettled state of the weather; but having once begun, he continued the practice pretty regularly, and that evidently with considerable benefit. He usually rose at six, walked the parade till eight, breakfasted a little before ten, then rode out till three, dined at four, and resumed the promenade with his Queen and daughters till late in the evening, provided the weather was serene.

On the ninth their majesties made an aquatic excursion in the barge belonging to the Duke of Clarence; and as soon as they turned Portland Point, in full view of the ships of war, a royal salute was fired. So well were they pleased with this trip, that on the thirteenth they made another excursion round the bay, though the weather was rainy and tempestuous; but after attempting to make the Southampton frigate, the barge was obliged to return; and at half-past three their majesties landed at the pier. The next morning, on a signal given, the royal family embarked at the quay, and were rowed round the Magnificent to the Southampton; and as both ships were manned and richly dressed, they made a fine appearance. The Southampton, having received the royal visitors, stood out of the bay for the Channel; and after sailing round Portland, at half-past two returned to her anchorage, when their majesties went into the barge, and were landed at the pier.

On the fifteenth the weather was again too unfavourable for any excursion; but in the evening the whole of the royal family went to the play. Mr Hughes, the manager, intended to have erected a superb box for their majesties; but this being positively declined, three rows were raised in front for their accommodation; and over the centre was placed a canopy of crimson satin fringed with gold. Twenty-two places were taken for the royal family, who all seemed much pleased with the exertions of the performers.

The following day their majesties honoured Lord Rivers with a visit, at his seat near Dorchester; and in the evening they went on board the magnificent in the barge.

Early on Sunday, the nineteenth, the King bathed in the sea, as also did the Princess Elizabeth; after which both walked some time on the sands. At ten, His Majesty, the princesses, and suit, went to church, where Dr. Samuel Glass, one of the chaplains in ordinary, preached. The Queen, however, not being well, had prayers read in her private apartments.

Very early on Monday morning their majesties embarked in their boats, to go on board the Southampton; which they did not reach till ten o'clock, owing to its blowing fresh, with a hollow sea. The frigate instantly got under weigh, and was soon out of sight. The King and princesses experienced little or no inconvenience; but Her Majesty was so much indisposed, as to be kept with great difficulty from fainting till she reached the shore, where she landed about three, not quite so well pleased as with her former excursions.

She was, however, not so much daunted as to trust His Majesty to the perils of the ocean the next day without her friendly care; and at eleven the royal family went again on board the Southampton, when, after a pleasant trip of five hours, they returned to Gloucester Lodge to dinner.

On Wednesday, the twenty-second, their majesties had another pleasant cruise, with which the Queen was much delighted; but the Honorable Miss Townsend appeared very much alarmed by the rolling of the ship; and on being asked whether she was sea-sick, answered—"No, only sick of the sea." In the evening of the twenty-fifth the royal family went to see the King's old favourite, Quick, perform the character of TOUCHSTONE, in "As You Like it," for his own benefit, which of course proved a bumper.

On Monday morning, the third of August, the whole royal party embarked in the Southampton, for Lutworth Castle, the seat of Mr. Weld, where they arrived about four in the afternoon, and were met by an immense crowd of country-people, assembled in sporting groups, and dancing before them to the gates.

Here a still more agreeable spectacle presented itself in the appearance of the eight children of Mr. Weld, who were placed on the steps one above another, and singing "God save the King" as their majesties entered the vestibule. After partaking of an elegant collation, the illustrious visitors were conducted into the beautiful chapel of that edifice, where an anthem was performed in a style that drew from their majesties warm expressions of admiration. On leaving the castle a royal salute was fired; and about nine o'clock the royal party landed at the pier of Weymouth, from whence they proceeded immediately to the theatre, having ordered a play for that evening. While at Lulworth, a messenger had been despatched to the manager with directions that the farce should be performed for the amusement of the company before their arrival.

The next day the royal family paid a visit to Lord Digby, at Sherborne Castle; with which noble mansion, and the surrounding scenery, they were no less pleased than with the preparations made for their reception.

On Thursday the whole party embarked on board the Southampton, and stood out to sea, followed by the Magnificent; when, after running six or eight leagues, His Majesty expressed a wish to stand in for the land; on which the frigate was who walked before His Majesty's carriage, singing

they were met by the principal people of the town, day. On the arrival of the royal party at Bridport, of the town; and the Southampton sailing the same all the respectable inhabitants attending them out majesties and suite left Weymouth for Plymouth; Accordingly, on Thursday the thirteenth, their reception of his august visitors.

returned, to make the necessary preparations for the readily complied; and the noble viscount instantly beautiful seat in Devonshire, with which the King rived at Weymouth, to invite the royal family to his The following day Lord Mount-Edgemoune arrived full of spirits.

afternoon their majesties landed, very hungry, but this cruise most delightful, and about three in the gentle, and the sea a perfect mirror, rendered good manners. The weather being fine, the breeze teen pounder, soon brought the republican to ceiving, altered her course, and letting fly an eight-Queen and princesses; which the Magnificent per-bring her to with a gun, for fear of alarming the Douglas, having their majesties on board, would not proper respect to the King's pendant. Captain land, steered very near the frigate, without paying ring this trip, an American vessel, bound to England, and almost touching each other's sides. Dur- afforded a beautiful spectacle, the two vessels cheer- put about, and passing the line of battle ship,

"God save the King," accompanied by a band of music, with colours flying. Besides a kind of canopy, with a handsome crown, over the royal coach, there were three triumphal arches erected; one at the entrance, another at the town-hall, and the third at the west end of the town; on all of which were loyal inscriptions.

On reaching Chadwick and Charmouth hills, His Majesty got out of the carriage, and walked a considerable way with most of his attendants; thus affording the country-people a fine opportunity of approaching the royal presence, which several of them gladly embraced. With the persons nearest to him the King talked familiarly, and on those at a greater distance he smiled, and bowed in a most gracious manner. The villagers at Charmouth had erected a lofty triumphal arch of oaken boughs, decorated with an immense crown of laurel; which rustic trophy was viewed by their majesties and the princesses with much pleasure. At Axminster the royal party stopped to visit the carpet manufactory, of which they examined the whole process. Her Majesty gave an order for several pieces; and on leaving the place, a liberal sum was left to be distributed among the work-people.

On approaching Honiton, the illustrious travellers were surprised at the turnpike with the appearance of near four hundred female children, neatly dressed, and headed by the young ladies of the boarding-school, all in white; which pleasing spectacle drew tears of sympathy from the eyes of Her Majesty and the princesses.

From Honiton the royal party drove to Sir George Yonge's, at Eastcot, where they dined; and after taking coffee proceeded to Exeter, which place they reached about seven in the evening. At the boundaries of the liberties they were met by the mayor and corporation, with an excellent band of music; and when they came to the city, the keys, according to custom, were presented to the King, who returned them to the mayor, saying: "They were already in very good hands." Then their majesties were conducted amidst a prodigious concourse of people to the dean's; and after shewing themselves at the windows, to gratify the anxious populace, they partook of an elegant supper, which had been provided by Dr. Butler, the dean. The same night a general illumination took place; and many elegant transparencies were displayed; the Guildhall, in particular, was lighted up with twelve hundred lamps of various colours, which, with the paintings intermixed, made a most beautiful appearance.

On Friday morning, about eleven, the mayor and corporation attended with an address, and were very graciously received. This was followed by another from the clergy, which met with the same reception. After these ceremonies the royal visitors proceeded to the cathedral, where His Majesty was much struck with the magnificent painted window over the west door. The organ was finely touched by the late ingenious William Jackson, and the choir sang "Te Deum" in a masterly style.

From the cathedral the royal travellers went to the episcopal palace; and after walking on the promenade called the Northern Hay, they returned to the deanry to dinner.

About nine o'clock on Saturday morning their majesties and suite left Exeter; and by three in the afternoon reached Saltam, the seat of Lord Boringdon, now Earl of Morley, where they were greeted by a royal salute; and in the evening the house was brilliantly illuminated.

The next day, being Sunday, the royal family went to Saltam chapel, and heard divine service performed by the Rev. Mr. Mayow, domestic chaplain to Lord Boringdon. About two o'clock the same day the Duke of York arrived; in honour of whom royal salutes were fired from the citadel and batteries.

Their majesties after public worship visited the groto, bathing house, and orangery, while the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth took an airing round Saltam Park.

After breakfast, on Monday, the royal party set out for Plymouth, where the inhabitants had erected at the entrance a triumphal arch, outside of which arrangements were made for a procession: the band of the South Devon militia, preceded by constables, walked first; then the mayor and corporation; then the King, Queen, princesses, and royal suite. The whole moved slowly through the town, amidst a numerous concourse of people, with bells ringing, guns firing, and the music playing. Their majesties, who appeared in excellent spirits, shewed every attention to the spectators; and on taking leave of the corporation, after passing the boundaries of the borough, the King expressed his satisfaction at the respectful manner in which he had been received. A daylight illumination at the mayor's door attracted the royal observation; on account of its singularity and pleasing effect. It consisted of His Majesty's arms, with a star emitting a continued ray of light; the motto, "He liveth and reigneth."

About eleven, the royal suite reached the Dock, where they were received by the troops in garrison, and saluted with a feu de joie. The cannon on the ramparts also fired, and were answered by the fort at Plymouth. Their majesties alighted at Com-missioner Lestrey's, in the Dock Yard; and after taking some refreshment, proceeded to visit the Impregnable of ninety guns. Admiral Bickerton's flag ship. The King's barge, which was steered by Captain Byard, had the royal standard flying, and was preceded by the admiral's barge: the rest following in their different stations to the number of about forty, which, together with the various pleasure-boats, and the beauty of the day, formed the finest sight imaginable. An exceeding handsome cutter, rowed by six young women, and steered by a seventh, all habited in loose white gowns, with nankeen safeguards and black bonnets, each wearing a sash across her shoulders, of royal purple, with "Long live their majesties," in gold letters, kept close to the King's barge to and from the ship.

As their majesties ascended the quarter-deck of the Impregnable, a salute was fired as well from her as from every ship in the harbour and Sound, the citadel and small forts joining in the same, and also the Lynx, a Dutch man of war, lately arrived from the East Indies.

Their majesties remained on board about an hour, and when they put off, the standard and admiralty flags were hauled down, after which the ship was dressed in less than a minute with the colours of all nations. This appeared to attract the notice of the Queen and princesses more than any thing they had before seen, and they lay alongside the ship for some time to admire the novel spectacle.

On landing, their majesties visited the ships in the dock, particularly the Gibraltar, which had been fitted up for their reception. This ship, taken by Lord Rodney, in the presence of the Duke of

Clarence struck them wonderfully, being one of the finest two-deckers in the service.

At half past three, the King, Queen, and princesses, left the dock, and proceeded in state barges up Cat-water to Salttram. They were attended by an immense number of sloops, barges, and boats; the forts, the ships at anchor, and, lastly, all the guns in the park, saluting as they passed.

With such splendour and gaiety had the day passed, when a dreadful accident happened to throw a gloom over the general joy. A small sloop, without ballast, lying off Mutton Cove, opposite the gun wharf, was so overloaded with people that she upset, and twelve persons were drowned. The disaster did not occur till some minutes after the passing of the royal barge, so that their majesties were spared the shock which such a melancholy sight must have produced. On being informed of it after their return, they made enquiries into the circumstances, and ordered where assistance was necessary that it should be supplied at their expense; at the same time promising to provide for such widows or children as might have been left by any of the sufferers.

About eight on Thursday morning the King went on board the Southampton, to witness a grand naval review and mock engagement in the Sound, the sight of which afforded him considerable pleasure. On Friday, His Majesty, unaccompanied by the royal family, went to the Victualling Office, in order to examine the state of the provisions, but without giving any previous notice of his intentions. Here he ordered a cask of beef to be opened promiscuously, and a piece to be taken out, which was sent immediately to Saltram, with orders that it should be dressed that day for his own dinner. The King then visited the lower fort, citadel, ramparts, and storehouse, and last of all the subterraneous works, into which only the Duke of Richmond, the governor, and chief engineer, were suffered to attend him.

When His Majesty mounted the upper part of the garrison, he was met by the mayor and corporation of Plymouth, the invalids, and a detachment of the South Devon militia, who attended him in his walk round the ramparts, the music playing "God save the King." At the governor's house, the mayor and corporation presented a loyal address, which was most graciously received; and they all had the honour to kiss the King's hand. His Majesty then left the fort, and proceeded by water to the gun wharf, where he surveyed the ordnance; after which, the workmen, headed by the chaplain, walked in procession before him according to their callings, and carrying the instruments of their labour, with which sight the King was very much amused.

The following day their majesties went to pay their promised visit to Mount Edgcumbe, where they landed about ten o'clock, and were received by the noble owner of that romantic seat. Having stopped to take a view of the house, the august visitors perambulated the enchanting woods and groves by which it is surrounded. This visit was, indeed, marked with uncommon magnificence and taste. Sixteen young maidens, dressed in white, preceded the royal party, strewing roses, carnations, myrtles, and jessamines, in their path; and when they came to the steps leading to the grand arcade, each female on her knee presented an elegant bouquet to their majesties, by whom it was graciously received. In the same walks, particularly upon Maker Heights, the King, was astonished at the grandeur of the scene; and the Queen and princesses beheld it with equal rapture. The dinner and dessert were in the most sumptuous and elegant style: two tables were laid out in the great hall, at the first of which sat the royal family, and at the second the Duke of Richmond, and the other great officers of state. The Queen was attended by the young and beautiful bride of the honourable Mr. Edgcumbe, the viscount's eldest son. Their majesties staid to coffee, and at six left the house, attended through the Sound up to Saltram by a large fleet of boats and barges, highly delighted with their day's entertainment. At night the mansion of Mount Edgcumbe was most brilliantly illuminated, which, when beheld from the opposite shore, gave it the appearance of an enchanted castle.

The next day the royal family visited Maristow, the seat of Mr. Heywood, but now of Sir Manasseh Lopez, situated on the banks of the Tamar. Tadmerton Woods, belonging to this estate, extend nearly three miles, along the river, in the most striking and romantic situations, though in many places the precipices have a tremendous aspect. Several new roads were now cut through these woods for the accommodation of the royal visitors, who spent near two hours in surveying and admiring the sublimity of the scenery. In Bickley Wood, which is about half a mile behind the house towards Tavistock, their majesties and the princesses amused themselves till near five o'clock; and having taken some refreshment, they returned to Saltream, with a promise of renewing their visit to breakfast on the Monday following. Accordingly, at an early hour, the whole party set out for Maristow, that they might lose no time in exploring the variegated beauties of a place with which they had already been so much delighted. Here they spent the greatest part of the day in traversing the woods, climbing rugged heights, and walking along the winding banks of the river, charmed at every turn.

with some new prospect that burst upon their view, and the picturesque effect of which abundantly gratified them for their labour. At four in the afternoon the royal party took leave of Mr. Heywood, and returned to Saltram to dinner.

The pleasure derived from the preceding excursions tempted their majesties to set out the next morning for Saltsash ferry, where the barges were in readiness to carry them higher up the Tamar, the prospects from which furnished amusement sufficient to detain them till late in the afternoon.

On the following day, at an early hour, they again went to the ferry and embarked, in order to extend their navigation along the course of the river to a still farther distance than they had hitherto been; and after a propitious voyage, which was much enlivened by the crowds who lined both shores as they passed, the royal party landed at Kitley, an ancient demesne belonging to the Edgcombe family, and situated about fourteen miles up the Tamar. The noble owner of this mansion was in readiness to receive his royal visitors on their landing, and that with the becoming dignity of a baron of old times. The ramparts of the castle were occupied by his vassals; and his lordship was attended at the water-side by a numerous train of tenants and dependants, who shouted "God save the King." Suitable cars, with four wheels each, and drawn by two ponies, had been provided to convey their majesties and the princesses to the castle, which stands on a lofty eminence about a quarter of a mile from the banks of the river. On the arrival of their majesties at the outer gate, twenty-one pateraroes were fired in honour of the illustrious visitors. After viewing the antique curiosities of the castle, particularly the armoury, and partaking of some refreshment, which was highly relished by keen appetites, the whole party re-embarked, with the intention of proceeding to the Salmon Weir, which for bold and picturesque scenery far exceeds all the views on the Tamar; but unfortunately, by stopping at Kitley, the advance of the tide was lost, and their majesties were obliged to return to Saltrein about two in the afternoon, much gratified with this fresh-water navigation, though disappointed in being under the necessity of shortening it.

The next day the King held a naval levee, when he was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on Captain Thomas Byard, who had constantly steered the royal barge; several officers also received promotion, and the following sums were distributed by His Majesty's orders: viz. fifteen hundred pounds to the artificers and labourers of the dock-yard, victualling-office, and gun-wharf; two hundred and fifty pounds to the poor of Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Dock; and two hundred to the crews of the barges that attended him during his stay.

It being known that their majesties would leave Saltram the following morning, an immense multitude assembled in the park, eager to catch a glimpse of the sovereign and his august consort ere they departed. Ever desirous to gratify the loyal wishes of their subjects, the King and Queen placed themselves near the windows, till curiosity became so troublesome that they were obliged to retire. An elderly woman, more forward than the rest, had the effrontery to thrust a petition through the window where Her Majesty stood. The paper fell on the inside, at the Queen's feet, who hesitated a little, then stooped and took it up, which act of extraordinary condescension greatly affected the populace. This was an application for admittance into an asylum appropriated to decayed widows, and the daughters of persons in the naval service; and though the manner of presenting the request was far enough from being respectful, the favour was granted.

The next morning their majesties took leave of their noble host, with many kind expressions for the entertainment they had experienced during a stay of twelve days, in all of which they had enjoyed, to use their own words, inexpressible delight. The princesses left this part of the country with regret; and the eldest was heard to observe to one of her sisters, while walking on the side of the Tamar, "We never before had the pleasure of seeing nature in the perfection of beauty: our lives hitherto seem to have been spent in a cloister rather than in a kingdom abounding every where with lovely prospects, and inhabited by a generous people."

At three o'clock in the afternoon the royal party reached Exeter, where they dined, and passed the night with the dean. The next morning, at eight, they proceeded to Weymouth, without stopping any where on the journey; and about four o'clock their majesties alighted at Gloucester Lodge in high spirits, and to the universal joy of the inhabitants.

On the following Monday the weather, which for some days had been unfavourable, cleared up, and the royal family resumed their marine excursions. About eleven in the forenoon, the King, Queen, and princesses, accompanied by the Lords Howe and Chatham, with several other noblemen and persons of distinction, went on board the Southampton, and with a pleasant gale, sailed off and on till near three in the afternoon, enjoying the breeze with much pleasure. During this little cruise, the frigate several times passed so near the stern of the Magnificent as to touch the fly of her ensign. In the course of the day, the Queen presented Captain Douglas with a gold medalion, representing the ship which he commanded, and desired that it should be worn by his lady as an ornament round her neck. A similar medallion was also presented to each of the ladies of the royal suite.

Their majesties having long wished to be present at the performance of divine service in a ship of war, went for that purpose on board the Magificent, in the morning of the sixth of September; when, as soon as the royal barge appeared, the yards were manned, and the marines received the illustrious visitors under arms. The King was much pleased with their military appearance, not less so with the neatness of the sailors in their Sunday dress. The arrangement was as follows: the King, Queen, and princesses, occupied the star-board side, under the quarter-deck awning. The lar-board side contained the nobility. In the centre of the quarter-deck stood the officers of the ship; and behind them were placed the ship's company and marines in the form of a crescent. Banners of different kinds were hung round the deck. The church service was performed by the reverend Mr. Clifton, chaplain of the Goliath, who concluded it with an excellent discourse, on these words of the psalmist: "Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

In his sermon the preacher took occasion to touch upon the presence of the sovereign, who had so recently been providentially restored to the prayers of his people. This appropriate allusion sensibly affected Her Majesty and the Princess Elizabeth, who were observed to wipe the pearly drops from their eyes: and when the service was over, the King and Queen went most kindly up to the clergyman, thanking him for his discourse, and hoping that the length of the duty had not fatigued him. Her Majesty, in particular, expressed the pleasure which she had felt from the sermon, a copy of which she condescended to request might be sent to Windsor. While the dinner was serving out to the ship's company, the royal family retired into the great cabin, except the Princess Elizabeth, who remained on deck for the purpose of seeing the sailors at their meal; an act of affable courtesy that gave the honest tars great delight.

Having taken some refreshment, the King desired the barge to be manned, and at two o'clock the royal family left the ship with the same honours as distinguished their entrance.

The next morning their majesties and the princesses visited Milton Abbey, where they were received by Lord Milton and Miss Damer; green baize strewed with flowers being spread from the door of the house to the carriages. After resting a little, the royal visitors made an excursion over the grounds; the ladies in open carriages, and His Majesty on horseback, accompanied by Lord Milton. The ride was prolonged till four o'clock, when the whole party returned to the Abbey to dinner, which in every respect did honour to the noble host, and gave great satisfaction to his illustrious guests.

On the following evening their majesties had a select party to a ball and supper, in commemoration of their wedding-day, which anniversary they never failed to keep while it could be enjoyed with mutual pleasure :

—————The seasons thus
As ceaseless round a jarring world they roll'd, Still found them happy; and consenting Spring
Shed her own rosy garlands on their heads.

The period of the royal residence at Weymouth being now nearly at a close, every day almost was devoted to bathing and aquatic excursions, for which last the whole party had conceived such an enthusiastic affection, that no weather could deter them from indulging in the amusement.

On Sunday, the thirteenth of September, after divine service at church, whither the royal family rarely ever missed going on foot, the King, Queen, and princesses, with the French ambassador, and other distinguished persons, walked on the esplanade a considerable time, surrounded by thousands of spectators. The same day His Majesty was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on Captain Andrew Snape Douglas, of the Southampton fir-

The next morning the royal party quitted Weymouth for the season, on a visit to the Marquis of Bath at Longleat, taking Sherborne Castle in their way, where they breakfasted with Lord Digby, after which they proceeded to Stourton, the seat of Sir Richard Colt Hoare, the beauties of which delightful place occupied their attention some time. About half-past five in the afternoon they arrived at Longleat, where many thousands of loyal subjects were assembled in the park, from every part of the country, testifying the joy which they felt at the sight of their sovereign, by singing "God save the King," in the chorus of which Her Majesty and the princesses took a lively part. On Tuesday morning the King and Queen rode round the grounds in an open chaise, to gratify the eager curiosity of the people, many of whom were afterwards admitted into the royal presence, in the apartments of the marquis's noble mansion, where a very sumptuous entertainment was provided for the royal guests.

After breakfast on Wednesday morning, about eleven, their majesties took leave of this hospitable family, and continued their route to Tottenham Park, the seat of Lord Aylesbury, where they arrived the same afternoon, and rested, according to a previous arrangement, till Friday, when they returned to the Queen's house at Windsor, in perfect health, after an absence of twelve weeks. As soon as the King and Queen got out of their carriage, they were welcomed home by the younger princesses, whose embraces they received most affectionately, and at the same time appeared not less pleased with the joy that their presence had lighted up in the countenances of the domestics of the royal household, and the surrounding spectators.

THE birth-day of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, on the twelfth of August, 1791, was celebrated with great splendour at Windsor, where the Queen gave a grand gala, in a style of, peculiar elegance, and on an extensive scale.

The party was both numerous and brilliant, more than three hundred persons of the first rank being present. The ball commenced as soon as their majesties were seated, which was about eight o'clock, and continued till twelve, when the whole company adjourned to St. George's Hall, to partake of an elegant entertainment. The royal family supped on a throne erected at the upper end of the hall, and their guests at two tables sixty feet long, which were decorated in a most beautiful manner. In the middle of one was a pedestal with a column, round which were entwined roses and branches of flowers. At the top was a flag, and under it was figured a resplendent glory, encircled with the order of the garter, and the portrait of the Prince in the middle, with the crest and feathers. On the angles of the pedestal were musical figures; and a circular motion was given to the whole by means of clock-work. Nothing could have a more pleasing effect, which was heightened by the fine illuminations in the room.

Gala at Windsor on the Birth-Day of the Prince.—Visit to Weymouth in 1791.—On Royal Progresses, and those of Queen Elizabeth.—Arrival of the Duke and Duchess of York.—Ceremonial of their Re-marriage.—Extra Drawing-Room.—Question respecting Prince's denry.—Theatrical Visits.—Celebration of the Queen's Birth-Day, 1792.—Anecdotes of the Duchess of York.—Another Visit to Weymouth.—Act of Charity.—War with France.

CHAPTER XVII.

Soon after this entertainment the King and Queen with three of the princesses, went to Weymouth for a few weeks: but though the appearance of royalty naturally drew a concourse of people thither, this visit was not marked with so much gaiety as distinguished the former residence of their majesties at this favoured watering-place.

While the sovereign and his august partner strove to gratify the loyal wishes of the people by every attention in their power, consistent with the dignity of their station, they carefully abstained from such spectacles as might prove burdensome to their subjects. In this respect their progresses were widely different from those of Queen Elizabeth, whose visits bore so very heavy upon the persons honoured with them, that they might without a quibble have been called visitations. Their majesties, however, fully merited the encomium bestowed upon that great princess, of whom an historian, who has delineated her character with great accuracy, says, "that in her progress she was the most easy to be approached: private persons and magistrates, men and women, country-people and children, came joyfully, and without any fear, to wait upon her, and see her. Her ears were then open to the complaints of the afflicted, and of those who had been any way injured. She would not suffer the meanest of her people to be shut out from the places where she resided, but the greatest and the least were then in a manner levelled. She took with her own hand, and read with the greatest goodness, the petitions of the meanest rustics; and she would frequently assure them that she would take a particular care of their affairs; and she would ever be as good as her word. She was never seen angry with the most unreasonable or uncourtly approach: she was never offended by the most impudent or importunate petitioner."

"This year witnessed an accession to the royal family, in the marriage of the Duke of York to the Princess Frederica Charlotte Ulrica, the eldest daughter of the late King of Prussia, by his first consort, the Princess Elizabeth Christina Ulrica, of Brunswick Wollensbuttle, and the only issue of that union. His royal highness, during his residence in Germany, had conceived an affectionate highness had undergone, she remained with her about noon. Owing to the fatigue which her royal duke and duchess with their suite on Dover beach pour, and after a boisterous passage, landed the of that day, however, the packet got out of the harbour, by adverse winds. Early in the morning from Monday till Friday the seventeenth of November had the additional mortification of being detained; and at Calais the illustrious travellers signs of royalty. Matters did not improve as they of their revolutionary spirit, by obliterating the en- of the vehicle till they had completely satisfied the carriage had attracted, and who kept possession danger, from the savage rout whom the arms on their royal highnesses were exposed to considerable all persons who had a respectable equipage. At Lille the name of liberty, and insulting, as aristocrats, large, committing the most abominable excesses in mobs which then abounded in every town and vil- they were very much annoyed by the brutal of Brussels and Lille to Calais. In this journey at Osnabrug, they proceeded for England by the way stopping about a week at Hanover, and four days capital on the seventeenth of October; and after September. The duke and duchess left the Prussian many took place at Berlin on the twenty-ninth of was soon obtained to the marriage, which cere- mutual, the consent of the parents on both sides attachment to the princess; and the sentiment being consort at Dover till the next day, when they set out for town; and between five and six in the afternoon reached York House, where the Prince of Wales received his royal sister in the great hall, and congratulated her in the German language on her arrival in England.

The duchess being too much indisposed to be presented that evening to their majesties, who were then at Buckingham House, retired immediately to rest, by the recommendation of the physician. On Sunday at noon the duke walked to Carlton House, and returned with the Prince, who staid at York House more than an hour. In the mean time all the nobility in town continued to leave their cards; but of course no persons were introduced. A little before four the Prince arrived again, and within a few minutes afterwards his royal highness handed the duchess to his carriage, the Dukes of York and Clarence following them. Upon their arrival at Buckingham House, the Duchess of York was conducted by the Prince of Wales on her right hand, and the duke on her left, into the grand drawing-room, where were the King, Queen, and six princesses, all of whom rose and advanced into the middle of the room to meet the stranger, who dropped on her knees before their majesties, but was instantly raised most affectionately between the King and Queen, surrounded by their happy children.

In about an hour afterwards, the Prince of Wales, reported.

the Duke and Duchess of York, and the Duke of Clarence, entered the palace, and were immediately conducted to Her Majesty's drawing-room. The prelates and the chancellor were in a separate apartment, preparing the form of the register. At nine o'clock, every thing being ready, the bishops and the chancellor were admitted into the royal presence; upon which, the procession, attended by the officers of the chapel-royal, proceeded to the grand saloon, where books of the marriage ceremony were delivered to all the royal family. At the request of the archbishop, a table was placed in the form of an altar, narrow enough for his grace to reach across, and join the hands of the royal pair. At half-past nine the ceremony was performed by the archbishop, assisted by the Bishop of London, His Majesty standing at one end of the altar, and the Queen at the other extremity; the Duke and Duchess of York in the centre, the primate opposite to them, and the lord chancellor standing behind him; the Prince of Wales next to the duchess, and the Duke of Clarence to his brother, the Duke of York. The princesses were seated on chairs at a distance from the altar. The Prince of Wales gave away the bride, who, at the conclusion of the ceremony, went to His Majesty, and attempted to kneel, which the King with some difficulty prevented, and raising her in his arms, affectionately saluted her, and presented her to the Queen.

The certificate of the marriage was then signed by their majesties, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Clarence, and the chancellor; after which his lordship and the bishops retired.

The royal family returned to the drawing-room, and at a few minutes before eleven the duke and duchess went to York House, accompanied by the Prince and the Duke of Clarence, who were entertained with an elegant supper.

On the following day the Queen held an extraordinary drawing-room at St. James's Palace, for the purpose of publicly receiving the Duchess of York, who went in state, and on her arrival waited first upon Her Majesty in her private apartment; after which she passed through the guard-chamber into the drawing-room, where she paid her respects to the King, and in the course of half-an-hour returned to York House. On this occasion her royal highness wore a bandeau of brilliants on her head-dress, in which were three diamond pins that had been given to her by the King. She also wore a rich pair of diamond ear-rings, and a necklace, the presents of Her Majesty, with other ornaments of great beauty. The whole of the royal family, except the bride and bridegroom, were elegant silver favours; and the same day the Princess Sophia was at the drawing-room for the first time. This marriage having produced some speculation and difficulty respecting the order of precedence, whether the Duchess of York was entitled to rank immediately after the Queen, or the princesses, Her Majesty wished to set the question at rest, by a reference to the College of Arms. Accordingly, the case was submitted to the consideration of the Herald's Office, who decided, that rank dates from birth, without any relation to marriage, and therefore, that the princesses of England, as being in the line of succession to the throne, in failure of male issue, took precedence of a princess of Prussia. This determination corresponds with the rule in Blackstone, that all single ladies rank as their eldest brother does in the life-time of his father.

This solicitude on the part of the Queen was not only expressive of her maternal feelings, but an instance of her great prudence, in taking care at this early period to provide against any unpleasant disputes that might arise hereafter about points of etiquette.

Royal marriages, especially where many interests are involved, too often occasion jealousies and intrigues; but never did one bring more harmony with it than the present, though in an essential point it has not been crowned with the fruition which the hopes of the family and the nation fondly anticipated.

On the twenty-eighth of December their majesties, with the Prince of Wales, the Princess-Royal, the Duke and Duchess of York, the Duke of Cla-through which they passed being formed by six or ties and the princesses was announced, the ladies about two o'clock, the arrival of their majesties and the first nobility came early, and array to etiquette, but compelled by the pressure. assembly increased, some few persons passed, conversing leading to the drawing-room, into which, as the assembly, occupying chiefly the three anti-chambers between twelve and one, the company began to to the royal family.

The Queen's birth-day, this year, exhibited a most brilliant court, on account of the late addition severely praised.

one person was trodden to death, and others were small, the rush at the pit door was so violent, that immense assemblage of persons; and the theatre being tion of "Cymon," which of course drew an immense royal family went to see the fourth representation of their own establishment. On that day Lane company were then performing till the restoration at the Haymarket Theatre, where the Drury But on the third of January a different scene occurred, and the appearance of the whole royal party afforded great pleasure to a crowded house of diamonds; and the ground scarlet, with a profusion represented. The Queen was dressed in a rich gowns," and the pantomime of "Blue Beard," were went to Covent-Garden Theatre, where the "Dance, and the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, seven rows in each of the apartments. The King passed through this avenue, noticing the company on each side, but without stopping for conversation. The Queen, on the contrary, spoke for one or two minutes to almost every person whom she knew, particularly in the last anti-chamber, which was nearly full of ladies, with whom she conversed separately, and with great affability, for some time. The drawing-room filled immediately on the entrance of their majesties, when the King remained on the right side, and the Queen on the left, very near to the doors, but without approaching the throne. The crowd now became so great, that many ladies were more than an hour in passing from the doors to the circles, though not distant above four yards, while some, unable to support the fatigue, went away. The pressure was chiefly on that side of the room occupied by Her Majesty; for there were the princesses, and as many ladies as could approach them, forming not so much a circle round the Queen as a lane extending on her left, as far as the Princess Sophia, the most distant of their royal highnesses. The Duchess of York, during the short time she stayed, remained with the Queen; but soon after her arrival she became indisposed, and having walked into the second anti-chamber, fainted away. Iartshorn and water were immediately brought, and her royal highness was soon sufficiently recovered to return home.

When the duchess set out from York House she was saluted with the music of marrow-bones and cleavers; the discordancy of which startled her at first; and it was with great difficulty that her royal highness could be made to believe that this curious concert was intended as a compliment. On its being explained, she bowed courteously to the palace, and ordered a present to be given to the performers, who rent the air with acclamations.

Another instance of her affability appeared in the manner with which she celebrated her royal consort's birthday, the same year, when she gave a grand dinner at Oakland to all the duke's tradesmen, allowing each of them two guineas for the expense of a carriage from town. After the entertainment there was a dance, and the duchess opened the ball herself, with the Prince of Wales. In the course of the same summer, a company of strolling players, having obtained leave to exhibit in a barn at Weybridge, petitioned her royal highness to honour the performance with her presence, to which she consented, and gave tickets to all her servants. Soon afterwards, a Methodist teacher came to preach a charity-sermon in the same theatre, and application was again made to the duchess to visit the place, which she complied with; but the servants desired to be excused, on the plea that they did not understand English. "Oh!" said her royal highness, "you had no objection to go to the comedy, which you understood much less ; and so you shall go to the sermon." The duchess accordingly went with all her train, and contributed handsomely on the occasion, as well for them as for herself.

The conclusion of this summer was spent by their majesties and the princesses in a private manner at Weymouth, for which place they seemed to have a growing attachment. During this visit, the royal party rode over to Dorchester, where, among other objects, they inspected the new county gaol, when a farmer, of the name of Pitfield, who had been confined there seven years, for a debt amounting to two hundred and twenty pounds, incurred by a lawyer's bill, presented a petition on his knees to the King, who caused the money to be paid ; and thus the poor man was immediately restored to his liberty and friends. Such were the acts of our gracious monarch, in which he had always the cheerful concurrence of his beloved partner, both being most happy when contributing to the happiness of others, and never feeling more uneasiness than when their means were inadequate to the relief of human suffering.

With what acuteness of sensibility, therefore, they must have contemplated the agonizing tragedy at this time exhibited on the bloody theatre of France, may be faintly conceived, but cannot be described. The condition of the poor emigrants, thrown upon our shores, to escape the worse than savage fury of their brutalized countrymen, excited the tender commiseration of the whole royal family, whose bounty, though secret, was extensively liberal, and delicately bestowed, particularly where the objects of it had been precipitated from allience to wretchedness, incapable of digging for a livelihood, and ashamed to beg for support.

But while there was a consolation in relieving these exiles, who, with all their misfortunes, might be considered as so many persons saved from the fury of a tempest, the compassionate hearts of our sovereign and his consort sorrowed deeply for the illustrious victims who were left to perish in the revolutionary storm, a melancholy sacrifice to that accursed Moloch, the madness of the people.

When the Countess of Sutherland, now Marchioness of Stafford, arrived from Paris, and related to their majesties a small portion only of the horrors which she had witnessed, and among other things, mentioned the circumstance of her having sent many articles of her own dress to the hapless Maria Antoinette, as well as some of her son's for the young dauphin, all of which were thankfully received, the feelings of the King and Queen were so completely overpowered, that they both wept during the affecting narrative.

Shortly afterwards, the mildest monarch that ever sat on the throne of France, was murdered for his virtues; and before the expiration of the year, the royal widow was dragged from her cell and bed of straw, to glut the monsters with her innocent blood.

In the mean time, the insolence of the new republic had compelled the English government to arm for self-defence; and whatever may be said by those who are callous to revolutionary enormities, nothing short of the prompt measures then adopted could have saved this country from the horrors of anarchy. There were then, as there are now, men among us of such perverse dispositions, as to be indifferent to all consequences, for the sake of a political change; men who hailed the savage march of the French as the progress of liberty, and who gloried in scenes that were a reproach to human nature. Had the wishes and counsels of these persons prevailed, the probability is that our own calendar would have been marked in letters of blood, commemorating another anniversary of royal martyrdom. Happily, however, the fortitude of the sovereign, and the energy of ministers, proved an effectual mound against republican fury and internal faction. War being inevitable, three battalions of guards, destined for foreign service, marched off from before Buckingham House, in the morning of the twentieth of February, 1793, Her Majesty and the three eldest princesses honouring their departure with good wishes, and a courteousness of behaviour that sensibly affected both the private soldiers and their officers.

But this was not the only instance of royal goodness manifested towards the brave men who were called out in the service of their king and country at this period: for, besides actively promoting the subscription entered into among the ladies to provide flannel waistcoats for the troops, the Queen and all her amiable daughters actually condescended to superintend the manufacture of those necessary articles of comfort.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Illegal Marriage in the Royal Family.—Dreadful Occurrence at the Haymarket Theatre.—Their Majesties visit the Fleet at Portsmouth.—Death of the Duke of Mecklenburg and his Sister.—Arrival of the Stadtholder and his Family.—Reception of the Turkish Ambassadors.—Marriage of the Prince of Wales.—Visit of the Queen to Lord Oxford.—Tour to Weymouth.—Attempts on the King's Life.—Violent Storm.—Injury sustained by Her Majesty.—A Female Lunatic.—Birth of the Princess Charlotte.—Domestic Unhappiness.—Reflections.

The year 1794 opened very inauspiciously to their majesties, whose parental feelings were much agitated by the recent marriage of Prince Augustus to Lady Augusta Murray, first at Rome, and next by banns at the parish church of St. George, Hanover Square, in express defiance of the statute. It has been confidently said, that His Royal Highness wrote a letter to his father, requesting permission to renounce any claims which he might have to the succession, on condition that the alliance which he had formed should remain undisturbed. This, however, was not in His Majesty's power to grant; and the marriage was accordingly pronounced by the proper legal court null and void. Disastrous of this nature are peculiarly affecting where they occur, though the bitterness of them cannot easily be conceived by persons in humbler life.

Shortly after the discovery of this irregular connexion, the subsequent dissolution of which evinced its imprudence, their majesties were distressed by one of the most dreadful accidents that ever marked their appearance in public. On the evening of the third of February the royal family went to the little theatre in the Hay-market, which drew as usual, on such occasions, an immense crowd of persons; and some, who were foremost in entering the pit, fell down, when the rush behind, like a torrent, not only prevented their recovery, but brought down others, over whose bodies the multitude passed into the body of the house, amidst screams and groans that were terrible beyond description. Fifteen persons were thus crushed to death, and about twenty more suffered so severely from the bruises which they received as to be incurable. Fortunately, their majesties did not witness the harrowing spectacle; but when apprised of what had happened, they made a resolution never to visit that place of amusement again. A very different scene engaged the royal attention in the following summer, on the arrival of Lord Howe at Spithead, with the ships captured by him in his hard-fought battle on the first of June. This seasonable victory had the effect of relieving the public mind from the depression produced by the gloomy state of affairs on the continent; and, therefore, His Majesty very judiciously determined to invigorate the national spirit by honouring the fleet with his presence. Accordingly, on Thursday, the twenty-sixth of June, the King, Queen, Prince Ernest, and the princesses, entered Portsmouth, where Lord Howe and the governor were in readiness to conduct the royal party to the Dock-Yard, from whence they all proceeded to Spithead. The King carried in his own hand a valuable diamond-hilted sword, which he presented to the noble admiral on board the Queen Charlotte, as a mark of his satisfaction and entire approbation. His Majesty also presented a gold chain to admirals Hood and Gardner; the like honour being likewise conferred on Sir Roger Curtis, first captain to Lord Howe. In the evening the royal family returned, and were rowed up the harbour to view the six French prizes, which lay there at their moorings. On Friday the King held a grand naval levee, when marks of distinction were bestowed upon several officers; after which, the party dined with the commissioner of the dock-yard.

The next day their majesties and family attended the launching of the Prince of Wales, a fine ship of royal party took to the barges. On Monday morning the King and his family went on board the Niger frigate, and sailed for Southampton, where they landed in the afternoon, and immediately proceeded in their carriages for Windsor. The Queen on her arrival received the tidings of the death of her eldest brother, Adolphus-Frederick, Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; and before the expiration of the court mourning on that occasion, news came of the demise of Her Majesty's sister, Princess Christina; which renders it necessary here to correct an inadvertent slip in a former night was coming on, their majesties and all the ship was delayed near two hours; and as the to the eastward of Cowes Point. By this accident little wind, she touched the ground in putting about, away towards the Needles; but there being very The Adulon, after sailing round the fleet, stood martial symphonies for the greatest part of the day. peated, and the bands of the different ships played frigate, and getting under sail, the salute was re- crews cheered. On their majesties entering the ship in consequence fired twenty-one guns, and the lotte were the signal for a general salute: when every proached the fleet, two guns from the Queen Char- Captain Stoford, at Spithead. As the barges ap- go on board the Adulon frigate, the Honorable ninety-eight guns; after which they embarked to chapter, where the death of this princess is erroneously stated instead of that of her aunt.

The aspect of the times was now exceedingly dismal, and the progress of the French arms became more alarming on account of the revolutionary principles which went along with the torrent, like the degrading doctrines of Mahomet with the swords of the Saracens. It was melancholy to see with what readiness the people of the neighbouring countries fraternized with the republicans, whose successes appeared to have obliterated the horror produced by their crimes. Holland, which had so often repelled the ambition of monarchical France, now seemed proud of being considered as a province of that country. The stadtholder in consequence was under the necessity of seeking an asylum in England, to escape the tender mercies of the new disciples of liberty; and on the twenty-sixth of January, 1795, his serene highness, accompanied by the Princess Frederica-Louisa-Williamina, his daughter, and Prince William-George-Frederick, his second son, arrived in London.

The reception which the illustrious fugitives met with was such as might have been expected, from the characteristic generosity of the nation, and the sympathetic feeling of their majesties. Immediate orders were given to fit up the palace of Hampton Court for their residence; and in the mean time they were accommodated with apartments at Kew, where the Queen frequently visited them, and contrived by every means in her power to make them forget the cruel persecution which had driven them into exile.

Another remarkable visitor, who made his public appearance at the British court at this time, was the ambassador from Constantinople. On the fifth of February, his excellency and suite came to town in grand procession; and the concourse of people was so great, that when they arrived at St James's, the horse and foot guards had considerable difficulty in clearing the way. The ambassador addressed himself to the King in the Turkish language, which was translated by the dragoman; and the same ceremony was repeated to the Queen, after which the drawing-room commenced, and the business of the court proceeded with the accustomed forms.

The presents sent to the King by the Grand Signior consisted of a pair of pistols, the stocks and barrels of which were of solid gold; four Arabian horses, with bridles and saddles trimmed with gold, and a gold dagger and belt, ornamented with pearls and diamonds: to the Queen and princesses a chest of silks, embroidered with gold, and a noble plume of feathers united at the bottom by a band of solid gold, and ornamented at the top with diamonds; chests of rich silks also were presented to the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Portland, and Lord Grenville.

Soon after this an event occurred that diffused great joy over the nation, and created high expectations which were never realized. This was the marriage of the heir apparent with his first cousin, the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, which ceremony was performed in the presence of their majesties, and a brilliant assemblage of the nobility, on the evening of the eighth of April this year, at the chapel royal.

At the beginning of July, Her Majesty, accompanied by her six daughters, the Duchess of York, and the Princess of Orange, did the late Earl of Orford the honour of a visit at Strawberry Hill, where they remained three hours perfectly delighted with the curiosities of the mansion, the gardens, and the prospect. In a letter written to General Conway a few days afterwards, his lordship says, "The Queen was uncommonly condescending and gracious, and designed to drink my health when I presented her with the last glass, and to thank me for all my attentions. Indeed, my memory de velle cour was but once in default. As I had been assured that Her Majesty would be attended by her chamberlain, yet was not, I had no glove ready when I received her at the step of her coach; yet she honoured me with her hand to lead her up stairs; nor did I recollect my omission when I led her down again."

The latter part of the summer was spent by their majesties and all the princesses at Weymouth, from whence they did not return till the autumn, when the situation of public affairs rendered an early call of parliament necessary.

It being announced that the King would open the session in person on the twenty-ninth of October, an immense crowd assembled in the park, many from mere curiosity, but others with the most desperate designs of mischief. As the state carriage passed along, it was with great difficulty the guards could clear the way; and near the Ordnance Office a bullet, supposed to have been discharged from an air-gun, perforated the glass, but happily without doing any other injury.

His Majesty, with his characteristic coolness and intrepidity, said to Lord Westmoreland, "That's a shot," and instead of leaning back, or striving to avoid the assassin, he pointed towards the round hole in the window, and carefully examined it. On entering the House of Peers, he said to the chancellor, "My lord, I have been shot at;" but immediately proceeded to the important business before him, and having delivered his speech from the throne, returned as if nothing had happened. The same gang of ruffians, however, followed his coach in great numbers; and as the carriage passed opposite Spring Garden Terrace, another stone was thrown, which fortunately only struck the frame-work between the windows. The crowd now pressed so closely round the coach, that His Majesty, in some agitation, waved his hands to the guards on each side as a signal to keep off the multitude. In this way he proceeded on through the park, and round by the stable yard into St. James's Palace, at the front gate. Here again a fresh tumult took place just as the King was about to alight; which proved too plainly the murderous designs of the ferocious rabble; but providentially they were frustrated in their object, which disappointed enraged them so much that they attacked the coach with stones, and did it considerable injury; continuing this species of mischief all the way along Pall-Mall to the Mews. Notwithstanding these dreadful appearances, the King ordered his private carriage to be brought up, and in a few minutes entered it to go to the Queen's House, though surrounded by a tumultuary and infuriated horde, every one of whom seemed bent upon assassination. There being now no guards to intimidate them, the mob rushed upon the carriage with savage fury, and one miserably attempted to burst open the door. This attack was made by sixteen or seventeen wretches, who issued forth from the great mass; and then it was that the person of the sovereign was in the most imminent danger. A gentleman of the Navy Office, who stood by at the time, put his hand into his pocket, and cocked a brace of pistols which he had with him, when seeing the life-guards at a distance, it immediately occurred to him that their assistance would be more effectual than his own; he accordingly ran with the utmost speed, and brought them up to the rescue of their master; but fortunately His Majesty's coachman had already succeeded in extricating the carriage from the mob; and the ruffians, having already mingled with the crowd, it was impossible to mark any of them. One of the guards, however, on coming up, perceiving a fellow as he thought forward in assailing the King, lifted up his sword, and would have cut him down, had he not been prevented from doing so by the gracious interposition of His Majesty.

The situation of the Queen and Princesses during these commotions, some knowledge of which could not be kept from them, may easily be conceived; and yet it is a fact that His Majesty related the occurrences to them with as much calmness as if his life had not been any way endangered; nay, more; confident in the attachment of his people, and the protection of Providence, he went with Her Majesty and three of the princesses the very next day to Covent Garden Theatre. At the entrance of the royal visitors, the house, which was thronged in every part, resounded with, "God save the King," and this loyal song was called for three times during the evening.

Between the hours of one and four in the morning of the sixth of November, a hurricane raged with a degree of violence that perhaps was never exceeded in England, unless in the great storm of the year 1704. Their majesties, who were at Buckingham House, arose from their beds, as did many hundreds of families, in and about town; for such was the fury and pressure of the elemental strife, that scarcely any fabric seemed capable of resisting its force.

The moral atmosphere was not less dismal at this period; and the historian of the present reign will have to record, with serious concern, the fact, that after the outrageous proceedings at the opening of the session of parliament, when the monarch had nearly been torn in pieces by the populace, persons of rank, calling themselves the Whig Club, published a declaration to the people full of inflammatory matter, and tending to blow discontent into rebellion. The effect of this appeal to the worst passions of the public was exhibited in little more than a week by another attack upon the person of the sovereign; for on the night of the first of February, as the royal family were returning from the theatre to Buckingham House, about half way up Pall-Mall, a stone was flung at the coach, in which were their majesties, and the lady in waiting, which after breaking the window glass, and entering the carriage, struck the Queen on the cheek and fell into Lady Harrington's lap. The King took up the stone, and carried it with him to the palace. An investigation respecting this act of violence took place the next day at the office of the secretary of state at Whitehall, but without eliciting any discovery.

In less than a fortnight after this perfidious attempt, an extraordinary scene occurred at Buckingham House, into which a woman, genteelly dressed, contrived to gain admittance one Sunday evening, and was making her way to the Queen's apartments, when she was stopped by a female servant, who demanded her business, and where she was going. The strange visitant replied that she was going to her mother, Mrs. Guelph, the Queen, who had got some writings belonging to her; and that if they were not restored she would commit some horrible deed.

The woman upon this was committed for the night, and the next day conveyed to Bow Street, where, in her examination, she persisted in saying that her name was Charlotte-Georgiana-Mary-Anne Guelph, adding that the late Edward Duke of York was her father, that she was born at Rome, and had been sold to a gentleman in Spain, with more incoherences of the same kind, which left no room to doubt of her insanity, and proper care was taken of her.

Amidst the gloom which overspread the kingdom at this period, the birth of a daughter to the heir-apparent afforded some beams of comfort to the royal family and the people. This interesting event took place early in the morning of the seventh of January, 1796; and on the eleventh of the following month the baptismal ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of their majesties, who stood sponsors, with the Princess Royal as the representative of the Duchess of Brunswick. The Queen made the responses, and gave the name of Charlotte-Augusta to the royal infant; but the christening was conducted without any parade or entertainment, and at an early hour the company separated. The pleasure, however, afforded by this addition to the royal lineage was soon counterbalanced and alloyed by reports of a rupture in that quarter where it was reasonable to expect that such a blessing would have returned even the dying embers of affection. But the birth of the Princess Charlotte, instead of bringing union, appeared to have the contrary effect; and the coolness which had hitherto been only suspected, was now visibly manifested in a disjunction that assumed no disguise. Into a subject of so delicate a nature, it is disagreeable to enter; and were it not for the odious mass of cato a widow, a daughter, a brother, or a friend. As silently forgotten, than that by wanton meritment they might delight in the description, should be that caprice, obstinacy, frolic, and folly, however duct, are soon obliterated; and it is surely better of character, and the minute peculiarities of concrete features of the mind, the nice discriminations it might be told, it is no longer known. The deliknown can seldom be immediately told; and when less, and in a short time is lost for ever. What is personal knowledge, which is growing every day and records; but lives can only be written from History may be formed from permanent monuments persons, is the great impediment of biography. necessity of complying with times, and of sparing dison is peculiarly applicable in this place. "The What Johnson has observed in his account of Adno alternative when integrity is to be justified, may be to endure opacity in patience, there can be ing to be a virtue; and however commendable it beyond which moderation cannot go without carried to the excess of liberality. There is a line by a forbearance which has already, perhaps, been not be observed, nor the ends of justice answered, over in silence. But the laws of biography would in the kingdom, the whole should have been passed on that occasion, against the most spotless character lummy which malice invented, and party propagated.

the process of these narratives is now bringing me walking upon ashes, under which the fire is not extinguished, and coming to the time of which it will be proper rather to say nothing that is false, than all that is true." Scarcely was the hymeneal torch lighted than its flame went out almost before the altar, and within a few days it might have been seen that two minds more discordant worldly policy never linked together. The moral atmosphere of the British court had for above thirty years been so distinguished by its purity, as to have even liberties into decorousness of behaviour, and propriety of speech. What ever, therefore, had a tendency to injure such a state, could not fail to create uneasiness in those who were most immediately interested in preserving its high character uncontaminated. Although much must be allowed for errors to which superior rank is liable, there can be no excuse for voluntary degradation, or levities, that are destitute of the apology of youth. To specify these would be needless, since the lapse of years has only served to open the eyes of the incredulous, and to confound the impudence of faction, by an exposition which ought to make the people ashamed of their insatiation, and party zealots blush for their violence. Perhaps, however, the time is yet to come when prejudiced shall be wholly cleared away, and full justice referred to those who have hitherto long suffered by the grossest misrepresentation.

Immediately after the christening of the young princess, a negotiation was carried on through the medium of Lord Cholmondeley for an amicable separation of the parents; and before the end of April the terms were adjusted without demur or reproach. But though the settlement was conducted with all possible respect and privacy, and with every appearance of reciprocal candour, some how or another, that double engine of extensive good and indefinite mischief—the daily press, quickly became the vehicle of the most malevolent reports, calculated to inflame the public mind, and to destroy the peace of the royal family.

Mysterious hints were thus thrown out to excite commiseration for a helpless stranger, the victim of a dark but powerful conspiracy; and at length the organ of scandal ventured to insinuate that the most exalted female in the kingdom had descended to unworthy acts, in order to get possession of the foreign letters of her daughter-in-law. Whispers of this sort find willing hearers, and forward reporters, the one with a ready aptency to swallow whatever tends to sharpen curiosity, and the others to gratify their malice or their vanity. Unfortunately it often happens, that the eagerness to refute calumny only serves to give it a wider circulation; and so it was in the present instance, for the commendable feeling of Lord Jersey, under the foul charge covertly brought against his countess, of having betrayed the confidence reposed in her by the Princess of Wales, produced an epistolary discussion, in which every thing was satisfactorily explained, but the only point that required explanation.

It was said that in the preceding summer a packet of letters intended to go abroad was entrusted to the care of Lady Jersey at Brighton, but that the same never reached its intended destination. After the lapse of some weeks, inquiry was made, when on the part of the lady it appeared that the packet had not been committed to her charge, but to another person, who sent it by the coach. Thus far the case was simple enough, but how, or whether the parcel was lost became the question, to which no solution ever was found, though a very natural one might easily have been obtained had a discovery been intended. But the indifference with which the supposed loss was at first treated where it should have been most sensibly felt, had a very suspicious look, and certainly it but ill agreed with the importance afterwards attached to the circumstance. In the one instance it had the appearance of affectation, while in the other it bore all the characteristics of design. That the whole, indeed, was an artifice, is but too palpable, for the very surmise that the packet had been fraudulently arrested in its transit indicated a disposition to form the worst conclusions without data or the shadow of evidence, and consequently a mind capable enough of devising the scheme on which the base accusation was founded. The communication also of the circumstance to the world through the daily prints plainly showed the dramatic character of the business, and the object it was intended to answer. From what source the information came could not well be mistaken, and therefore this eagerness to excite curiosity at the expense of private feelings, not only marked a spirit ready to imagine evil things, but one delighting in scattering firebrands of the most deadly tendency, without caring for the consequences. The Queen was not unapprised of these attempts to injure her in the public opinion, and to sow discord in her family; but with a fortitude beyond all praise, she maintained a perfect equanimity and an absolute silence under the most scandalous imputations. This was neither apathy nor pride, but affection and prudence. She felt for those who were most dear to her; and in a tender concern for their tranquillity she avoided discussion and suppressed resentment.

CHAPTER XIX.

Death of Madame Schwellenberg.—Her Character.—History of the Princess Augusta-Caroline of Brunswick.—Arrival of the Prince of Wirtemberg.—His Marriage with the Princess Royal.—Her Majesty's Fete on that Occasion.—City Address.—Affecting Separation.—Procession to St. Paul's on the Thanksgiving Day.—Death of the young Prince of Orange.—Royal Entertainments.—A Review in Hyde Park.—Visit to Lord Romney.

The death of Madame Schwellenberg, which happened suddenly on the evening of the seventh of March, 1797, was a severe shock to the Queen, from whom she had never lived apart for the space of fifty years, having been Her Majesty's attendant at Mirow, her companion at Strelitz, and her most confidential servant, as mistress of the robes, ever since her arrival in England.

She was a well-educated and highly accomplished woman, extremely courteous in her manner, much respected by all the domestics of the royal household, and devotedly attached to the illustrious family with whom she lived, who, in their turn, entertained for her the sincerest affection. Madame Schwellenberg had been, however, most cruelly and wantonly held up to public ridicule by a pro-sister being married to the heir-apparent of that empire. On going to Petersburg, he took his wife and three children with him ; and the princess being then in the flower of her youth, of a lively disposition, and fascinating manners, soon became a favourite with the Empress Catherine, whose court and company were far from being favourable to female morals. Into that vortex of dissipation, however, did the prince imprudently draw his wife, and there leave her when he made his campaign against the Turks ; so that, in fact, he had no one to blame but himself, when, on his return, he found her principles contaminated, and her conduct the subject of general observation. In this situation the prince wrote to her father the Duke of Brunswick, informing him of his daughter's behaviour, and requesting his advice how to act under such circumstances. The result of this correspondence was a resolution that she should be removed out of Russia ; and the prince accordingly demanded leave of the empress to quit her dominions with his family. Catherine readily allowed the prince the permission he requested, as far as related to himself and his children, but refused to allow the princess to return to Germany. No remonstrances could induce the autocratrix to recede from her determination, and the prince, with his sons and daughter, quitted the Russian territories for Wirtemberg. About a fortnight after their departure, the princess was sent by an imperial order to the Castle of Lhörde, about two hundred miles from Petersburg, having been first deprived of all her German attendants; and before the expiration of two years the prince received a letter from the empress, informing him of the death of his wife, similar information being sent also to the duke her father. Thus terminates the history of the unfortunate Augusta-Caroline, though, as is always the case in such dark transactions, there were not wanting sceptics who called in question the veracity of the empress, and would not believe the account which she gave of the death of the princess. Many persons in Germany tenaciously maintained that she was still living in a state of confinement, or an exile in Siberia; and this was the constant opinion of the late Duchess of Brunswick, her mother, although her husband and brother were satisfied of the contrary.

The conduct of Catherine in this instance is difficult to be accounted for; since, if, as is natural to suppose, she was afraid that the princess would suffer the vengeance of her offended relatives, and therefore caused her to be detained out of regard to her safety, this concern for a favourite is hardly to be reconciled with her subsequent treatment. The Princess of Wirtemberg could not have endured more severity from her family than what she experienced from her pretended friend and protector;

and the most probable conclusion then is, that the empress, though far enough from concealing her habits, was unwilling to have the particulars of them disclosed in the German courts; on which account, and being conscious that the Princess of Wirtemberg knew too much of her secret history, she took the resolution of acting in this arbitrary manner. Such is that amity, which, having no other bond than the reciprocity of licentious propensities, is liable to be converted into jealousy and hatred, either by the caprice of new attachments, or through the fear of detection.

The cloud of obscurity that enveloped the catastrophe of this princess naturally excited much curiosity, and numerous conjectures, some of which were extremely harsh and unfavourable to her husband, who was even suspected of having contributed to the severity with which she was treated. This surmise was certainly unjust; but there were other circumstances connected with the history, that could not be so easily cleared up; and, as is usual in such cases, the irregularities of the sufferer were attempted to be palliated by recrimination.

When, therefore, the hereditary prince made an offer of his hand to the Princess-Royal of England, His Majesty was very much affected, and more so on perceiving that the overture met with a favourable reception on the part of his daughter. The King having before his eyes the tragical narrative of his unfortunate relative, as far as it was known, felt an extreme repugnance to the proffered alliance, nor was the Queen less averse to it; but their joint remonstrances were of no avail, nor could even the marvellous fate of her cousin deter the princess from giving an assent to the proposal. Her royal father, however, deemed it necessary to make a very close inquiry into the particulars that have been just detailed, before he gave his final answer; and having ascertained the fact of the death of the Princess of Wirtemberg in Russia, his consent was no longer withheld.

Matters being thus far settled, and her royal highness remaining in the same state of mind, the prince left Wirtemberg at the end of March; and on the fifteenth of April arrived in London, where he was waited upon by several persons of distinction; and the same evening he was introduced to their majesties and his intended bride.

The marriage, however, did not take place till a month afterwards, and in the mean time the King conversed much with his daughter on the subject, offering, if her mind should alter before the solemnization of the ceremony, to break off the engagement, and take all the responsibility upon himself. Such was the paternal tenderness of one, who in no instance was known to have ever violated the slightest promise that he had made; but in the present instance, feeling that his engagement was purely conditional, His Majesty hesitated, and waited till the last moment for the final decision of the princess, when finding that her determination was irrevocably fixed, he said no more; and the union took place with circumstances of great pomp at the Chapel Royal in the afternoon of the eighteenth of May. The service was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the assistance of his Grace of York, His Majesty giving away the bride; in doing which the whole audience observed how greatly he was agitated, while the Queen and the other princesses appeared overpowered with sorrow. When the religious service in the chapel was concluded, Her Majesty held a drawing-room, which was numerously attended; and on breaking up, the whole of the royal family, with the Prince and Princess of Wirtemberg, left town for Windsor Lodge.

It should here be stated, that the reluctance of the King to this marriage was increased by another circumstance, which pressed very heavily upon his mind; and this was the fear that the example of the reigning duke, who had turned Roman Catholic, might be followed in time by his son, the consequences of which His Majesty dreaded, as affecting his daughter. Without wounding the feelings of his highness on this delicate subject, our excellent monarch had some conversation with the prince on religious topics, and it afforded him considerable relief to find that, as far as appearances could go, there was no danger of his apostasy.

On the twenty-third of the same month, Her Majesty gave a splendid fête, in honour of the marriage, at Frogmore, which seat was now become her favourite place of retirement; and this was the second grand entertainment held here since its completion, the first being on her own birth-day two years before the present occasion.

At the drawing-room, two days afterwards, addresses were presented by the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London; that to the Queen containing the following well-timed and merited compliment, in congratulating Her Majesty on the marriage of her daughter.

“The numerous and endearing virtues, native in her royal mind, and cultivated with such exemplary assiduity by the brilliant and eminent conduct of her royal mother, form at once a subject of exultation and regret, even on this joyful occasion; of exultation, as we are satisfied that the dignity of her high birth is proudly equalled by her transcendently amiable qualities, which we have long admired and revered; and of regret, as by this promising source of conjugal felicity, the just reward of these qualities, the fair daughters of Britain will be deprived of contemplating, in the highest rank, one of the most conspicuous models of maiden excellence. We earnestly hope, Madam, that an union of such exalted promise may be crowned with every prosperity to the illustrious pair that a mother's most sanguine wishes can form; and that the rest of your majesty's fair descendants may be heiresses to blessings commensurate to the exalted virtues with which they are endowed."

To these gallant expressions, Her Majesty made the following reply :

" I return you my thanks for this very dutiful and loyal address of congratulation on the marriage of the Princess-Royal with the Hereditary Prince of Wirtemberg; and for those sentiments, so very favourable to myself, with which it is accompanied."

On Friday the second of June, their royal and serene highnesses quitted St. James's Palace for Harwich, escorted by a party of light dragoons. The princess was dressed in a blue riding-habit, with the star of the Russian order of St. Catherine at her breast. She endeavoured to appear cheerful; but the faltering accents with which she bade her attendants and the surrounding multitude farewell spoke her agitated feelings. None of the royal family were present, as they had all taken leave the preceding night at Buckingham House, when the scene was most affecting. Her Majesty and the princesses were bathed in tears, and her royal highness hung upon the neck of her father, overwhelmed with grief. At length, the prince, her husband, took her hand, and persuaded her to go with him, supporting her to the coach, whither they were followed by the King to take a last farewell of his beloved daughter; but his feelings were so much overpowered, that he could not even articulate the word adieu. This, considering the affectionate manner in which the family had uniformly lived together, was not to be wondered; for what could be more distressing than a separation which approximated the nearest to the last awful dissolution of the tender ties of nature? In private life the settlement of children by approved alliances contributes to cheer the hearts of parents, and to diffuse a brightness over their declining years, in the pleasing prospect of sharing the happiness of those they love; but here, on the contrary, such is the heavy tax imposed upon royalty, the nuptial festivities were mixed and shaded, as it were, with funereal gloom; since to their majesties this parting from a child, who had never lived out of their presence, even for a single day, was in all probability a parting for ever.

The year closed, however, with a brilliancy which could not have been augurised in the early part of it; and His Majesty, with his wonted piety, resolved to give a public expression of gratitude for the signal blessings which the nation had received. Accordingly, the nineteenth of December was appointed to be observed as a day of general thanksgiving for our great naval victories; and a grand procession to St. Paul's Cathedral, by the royal family and the two houses of parliament, then took place. The morning was remarkably fine, and the scene had an impressive effect, particularly in the choir of the church, on entering which their majesties were seated under a crimson canopy of state, the King on the right and the Queen on the left, with the princesses formed in a circle by her side. At the end of the first lesson a naval procession commenced, to choral music, from the body of the church to the choir, when the British admirals advanced with the colours taken in the three great victories gained by Lords Howe, St. Vincent, and Duncan. These flags were received from the gallant officers by the dean and chapter, who ranged them on both sides the altar in consecrated order; after which, a discourse was preached by the Bishop of Lincoln; and the service being concluded, the procession returned in greater state than it entered. Their majesties were preceded by the male branches of the family, the foreign ambassadors, &c., the Bishop of London being on the right hand of the King, and the Bishop of Lincoln on his left. The sword of state was borne by Earl Spencer, and that of the city by the lord mayor. The King appeared in blue and gold, the Queen in mazarine blue with a diamond head-dress: the princesses in the same coloured vests, with chained head-dresses of gold and white feathers. The ceremony continued till half past one, when their majesties returned in their coach of state to Buckingham House. No accident occurred to mar the splendour of the day, which terminated with great credit to all who had the direction of the several arrangements.

The following year glided smoothly away without any thing particularly remarkable in regard to the royal family, who spent the conclusion of the summer, as usual, at Weymouth, where the King and the princesses bathed in the sea regularly every morning, when the weather permitted. While at this gay place of resort, the news arrived of the splendid victory gained by Admiral Nelson over the French fleet on the coast of Egypt, which intelligence increased the gladness occasioned by the presence of royalty, and contributed to furnish additional festivities, in which their majesties cheerfully participated.

Of their readiness to enter into the sympathetic feelings of others, as well for sorrow as for joy, an instance occurred at the end of January, 1799, when the King, in reading a foreign newspaper at Buckingham House, was suddenly struck with a paragraph mentioning the death of the second son of the Stadtholder, at Venice, where, in the capacity of an Austrian officer, he fell a victim to the punctual discharge of his duty, in attending the military hospital, which, at that time, was infected by a contagious fever.

Their majesties were very much shocked at this melancholy intelligence ; and the Queen being fearful of its effects upon the Princess of Orange, immediately sent off a letter by a special messenger, to Hampton Court, requesting her company for a few days on some particular concerns. Without suspecting any thing of her misfortune, the princess hastened to town, and thus, by the address of the Queen, she was kept ignorant of the loss which she had sustained, till the arrival of letters from Venice, putting it beyond doubt the sad news was imparted to her by gentler degrees, whereby her mind was enabled to bear what otherwise might have been attended with fatal consequences.

The remainder of this year had a more cheerful aspect ; and though the pomp and parade of war prevailed, the military spectacles were so mixed with festivities as to present every where the ideas of security and gaiety, rather than of alarm and apprehension.

Two entertainments given by Her Majesty were of a domestic description, and tended in the renovation of joy to create expectations which were far from being realized. The first was a private fête at Frogmore, on the eighth of March, in grateful commemoration of the recovery of the Princess Amelia, whose life had been even despaired of for some time. This, therefore, was a scene of unmixed gladness, which could hardly be said of the other, for though in some respects it might have been termed a feast of conciliation, it was more a sacrifice to duty than affection. The King having long suffered much anxiety about the separation of the Prince and Princess of Wales, with a true paternal sensibility, wished to see the appearance, at least, of restored harmony in his family. To gratify his desire, it was agreed that the princess should be recalled to court, on the ensuing birth-day; previous to which, and to give a greater eclat to the circumstance, Her Majesty, on the evening of the sixteenth of May, had a grand ball and supper at her palace. About two hundred persons, the flower of the nobility, assembled round their amiable sovereign on this occasion; and it was grateful to see the blaze of royalty eclipsing the lustre of dress and the sparkling of diamonds. The company began to meet about eight, and at half-past nine the grand saloon was opened for dancing, which commenced with Scotch reels, the two first by the Duke of Kent and the Princess of Wales. At one the supper rooms were opened, when twelve tables, covered with a profusion of the choicest delicacies of the season, were displayed to view. This entertainment being finished, the nobility again resumed dancing; and at four the company departed.

Never, perhaps, during his long reign, did the King witness a prouder day, or one more delightful, on all accounts, to his patriotic heart, than on the anniversary of his birth this year, when he reviewed the various associations of volunteers in Hyde Park. These loyal troops assembled early in the morning, and on the appearance of His Majesty precisely at nine o'clock, a royal salute was fired by the artillery company. The sovereign then proceeded slowly along the line, and though it rained heavily all the time, he continued uncovered during the review; after which, the several corps, with the surrounding multitudes, made the air resound with acclamations. Her Majesty and the princesses, accompanied by the Countess of Harrington and Lady Mary Stanhope, viewed this sublime spectacle from the house of Lady Holder-nesse in Park Lane, and that of Lord Cathcart, where they partook of refreshments. The sight very much affected them; and even the monarch himself, as he surveyed this faithful cordon of subjects, walling him round as it were in lofty defiance of all his foes, could not refrain from expressing his feelings by a tear—but then it was the tear of gratitude.

The Queen afterwards held a drawing-room, which was one of the most splendid and crowded that had been witnessed for several years.

During the procession of the mail coaches in the front of the palace, the royal family appeared in the windows, and were repeatedly greeted by the populace; but what gave the most touching effect to the scene, was the Prince of Wales holding up his child to view the shew, and then delivering the young princess into the arms of her royal grandfather.

On the twenty-first of the same month, His Majesty set out on a circuit in and about the metropolis to inspect the different corps of volunteers, and about noon, joined the Queen and princesses at the house of the Lord Chancellor Loughborough, in Russell Square, where an elegant collation was provided; after partaking of which, His Majesty again mounted his charger, and proceeded to inspect the corps assembled in the front of the Foundling Hospital. While the active monarch was thus engaged, Her Majesty and daughters went into that noble edifice, with which they were extremely pleased, and particularly the performance of the children, who greeted them in the chapel with the air of "God save the King."

Another military spectacle, on a scale of splendid magnificence in this season of loyalty, was exhibited by the Earl of Romney, at his seat near Maidstone, where, on the first of August, the sovereign and his family attended to witness a grand review of the volunteers in that part of Kent. The announcement of this grand entertainment drew together thousands of eager spectators, not only from the surrounding towns and villages, but from places very remote. During the whole of the [preceding day Maidstone was in a bustle, which increased as the evening came on; and when night fell, no accommodation of any sort could be obtained for man or horse.

Happy were those who could squeeze themselves into a corner of the meanest alehouse; but the far greater number of strangers were obliged to bivouack with their cattle in the fields, lanes, and streets.

To give peculiar pomp to the volunteers, they marched into the town with drums beating and colours flying, accompanied by bands of music.

The royal standard was hoisted on the church, and flags were displayed from many of the houses. During the afternoon, the road to Moat Park, Lord Romney's seat, about a mile from Maidstone, was thronged with people going to see the preparations making for the reception of their majesties. A pavilion was erected on a rising part of the lawn, at the back of the house, for the royal family to dine in, and another nearly adjoining for the attendant nobility. The former was decorated with festoons of flowers, and the ground was covered with green baize. Ninety-one tables were placed near the spot in two divisions, for the volunteers, upon which cloths were laid, and knives and forks placed for near six thousand persons.

The whole length of these tables amounted to thirteen thousand, three hundred, and thirty-three yards, or nearly seven miles and a half, and the value of the wood-work exceeded fifteen hundred pounds.

Though the royal family left Kew as early as five in the morning, it was near twelve before they arrived at Lord Romney's, having stopped to breakfast with Lord Camden, and been otherwise delayed by the excessive badness of the roads.

The King came to the ground on his charger amidst a heavy shower of rain, and Her Majesty, with the princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, alighted at the tent prepared for their reception, into which the Queen invited as many ladies as it would possibly contain. As the volunteers and all the gentlemen present wore boughs of oak in their hats, the royal family wished to decorate themselves with some of the same, which were immediately brought, and the Queen and princesses put them in their caps and in their bosoms.

After the review, a signal gun announced dinner to the associations, and this sight, which for novelty equalled all the rest, was viewed with admiration by the august visitors, who sat down to a sumptuous entertainment in the pavilion, while the nobility did the same in a tent adjoining. The royal party consisted of the King and Queen, the two princesses, the Dukes of York, Cumberland, and Gloucester, the Stadtholder, and the Countess Harrington as lady in waiting. They were attended during dinner by Lord Romney, his son, and the honourable Misses Marsham, the three daughters of his lordship. The volunteers having finished their dinner, His Majesty's health was drank to martial music, by upwards of six thousand men, all standing uncovered. Then followed some other loyal toasts; after which some of the officers came up before the royal tent and sang "God save the King." About half-past five the several companies left the tables, got under arms, and marched off in different directions: on which, the royal family returned to the house, where they took coffee, and at six o'clock set off for town. To commemorate the spot where this distinction was conferred on the men of Kent, a subscription was entered into by the volunteers, for the erection of a handsome pavilion of stone, the cupola of which is supported by nine doric pillars, and the whole building is formed after the model of the Temple of the Sibyls at Tivoli, near Rome, and that of Minerva at Athens.

CHAPTER XX.

Two Attempts upon the King's Life.—Royal Fortitude.—Military Fête at Hatfield.—Splendid Entertainment at Frogmore.—Excursion to Weymouth.—Anecdote of an American Quaker.—Visit to the Island of Portland.—Return to Windsor.—Christmas Festivity.

HE that denies a particular providence in human affairs will not easily be convinced by facts of an extraordinary occurrence, even though they may shake his scepticism, because he has a word of convenient ambiguity, ever ready to be applied in all those cases which are out of the common course of events. And yet it will sometimes happen, when nothing short of incorrigible infidelity can ascribe that to chance which evidently carries with it the marks of divine interposition. The truth of this was remarkably evinced in the marvellous preservation of the King twice in one day, when in both instances there was not only a deliberate aim to take away his life, but that too in situations extremely favourable to the diabolical purpose.

On the morning of the fifteenth of May, 1800, while His Majesty was inspecting the evolutions of the grenadier guards in Hyde Park, during the firings a ball-cartridge was discharged, which passed very near his person, and penetrated through both thighs of a young gentleman belonging to one of the public offices, who happened to stand within a few yards of the King.

The same evening the royal family went to Drury Lane Theatre, and the King had scarcely entered the state box, when two slugs were fired directly at him from the pit. Her Majesty and the princesses were at that moment stepping into the box; but the King, apprehensive of the effect of the alarm upon their minds, waved his hand, and said, "keep back; they are firing squibs for diversion." Such was the admirable presence of mind of our venerable sovereign, and such was his affectionate tenderness, in an instant, when, for any thing he knew, more fire-arms were about to be discharged from the same quarter, and with the same nefarious object. Her Majesty; however, at length came forward, much agitated, followed by her daughters trembling with anxiety; and on finding from the uproar that something of serious import had occurred, they all joined in urging the King to return home, but, with his wonted fortitude, he replied, "No; sit down and be calm, for there is no danger; we will stay and see the entertainment out." They did so, and the audience manifested by reiterated plaudits their sense of this firmness, and their indignation against the assassin. The unhappy man proved, upon indubitable evidence, to be a lunatic; but considering the position in which he had planted himself, and the experience as a soldier which he possessed, it was certainly little short of miraculous that one of the balls had not a fatal effect. In both these attempts the deadly design was manifest, and conducted in each with the eye of practice; the escape, therefore, of the royal person under such peculiar circumstances, cannot be regarded as fortuitous, without supposing that the whole moral race are left destitute of government and protection, the slaves of fate, or the sport of accident.

When the royal party returned to Buckingham House, and His Majesty was about to retire to rest, he took a cheerful leave of his family, and said, "I hope and pray that the poor creature who has committed the rash assault upon me may enjoy as sound a repose as I trust that I shall this night."

In none of the various assaults made upon him did the King ever betray any thing like resentment against the unfortunate or misguided beings, who, from phrenzy or faction, presumed to commit acts of violence upon his person; nor could those repeated outrages induce him to adopt any precautions for his security. On the contrary, he rode and walked as usual, sometimes without any attendant, and, at the most, with only one or two servants. A nobleman, shortly after the serious attack in the playhouse, took upon him to remonstrate with His Majesty upon this exposure of his person, when the King answered, that the constant presence of a guard would be an irksome restraint which he could not endure, especially as indicating an unreasonable jealousy of his subjects, of whose loyalty and affection he entertained not the smallest doubt. "I know," said His Majesty, "that any man who chooses to sacrifice his own life may easily take away mine; but I only hope that if any one attempts such an act, he will do it promptly, without any circumstances of barbarity."

The twelfth of June, this year, was distinguished by one of those displays of loyalty which happily were not unfrequent at this period, and which brought to recollection the days of old, when the heads of the baronial houses rallied their dependants round the royal standard. This revival of the ancient spirit of hospitality and chivalry gave energy to patriotism, and drove faction to the den of hypocrisy.

Among the nobility who took a leading part in the national cause at this eventful period, the Marquis of Salisbury appeared with the characteristic zeal of his illustrious lineage. For near a month his lordship's magnificent mansion was the seat of busy preparations, to receive the royal family, at the grand review of the Hertford volunteers in Hatfield Park. In this business above one hundred servants and labourers were employed, under the personal inspection of the marquis, who was indefatigable in his exertions to arrange the tents for the accommodation of all the spectators. In the neighbouring inns also all was bustle and confusion. The cellars and larders were emptied of their liquors and provisions, which were transferred to booths erected in the park, and scattered among the distant clumps of trees, commanding a view of the military spectacle. Many of the visitors came on the preceding evening, but the gates of the park were not thrown open for carriages till seven in the morning, when several waggons entered, decorated with oak boughs, and filled with ladies dressed in white. At nine their majesties, in a chariot with four horses, entered through the principal lodge at the southern extremity of the park, having been only one hour and three quarters on their journey. Next followed a carriage in which were the Princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, and Amelia. Then came the Prince and Princess of Orange, and the Duke of York. In a quarter of an hour after his arrival, the King mounted his horse, and was followed by the Queen and three princesses in an open landau; to which succeeded another, containing the Princess Mary, Princess of Orange, Countess of Harcourt, and the Ladies Georgina and Emily Cecil. The Prince of Orange was in his own coach. These carriages drove to the Queen's marquee, which was on a rising ground, commanding a view of the whole line. It was boarded with oak in the most finished style, and covered with a beautiful Brussels carpet. Projected pannels of mahogany, with sash-doors, commanded a full view of the eastern and western front. Adjoining to this tent were two others, one for the ministers of state, and the other for the ladies. An elegant breakfast was laid for their majesties with a service of gold in the summer dining-room.

After the review the volunteers and their officers sat down to a substantial dinner in the park, as the royal guests did to one of the most sumptuous description in King James's room, in Hatfield House. At the head of the table sat their Majesties; on the right of the King were the Duke of Gloucester, the Prince of Orange, the Prince of Wales, and the Dukes of York and Cumberland. On the Queen's side were, the Princess of Orange, the Princesses Augusta, Elizabeth, Mary, and Amelia. At the lower end sat the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, the Countesses of Harrington and Chesterfield, with Ladies Georgina and Emily Cecil.

Among the principal ornaments of the room were two pictures, one a whole length of the King, with these words in gold letters on a wreath—"Preserved of God, beloved of his people!" The other was of Her Majesty, having this motto—"Favoured of heaven, the glory of her sex!"

The cabinet ministers and general officers of state

were entertained in another room. When the volunteers had dined, they all drank His Majesty's health, with three cheers, and afterwards sang "God save the King" in chorus. At half past four the royal family set off in their carriages amidst loud acclamations, the sound of martial music from the bands, and the general salute of the guns. Almost all the people of distinction in the country were assembled on this occasion; and the concourse, including the different military bodies, could not be less than fifty thousand persons.

On the fourteenth of the following month the Queen gave an entertainment of a new character in Frogmore Gardens, the management of which was entirely under the direction of the Princess Elizabeth. About two o'clock the royal family repaired from Windsor Lodge in their carriages to the house, consisting of their majesties, the five princesses, the Prince of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of York, the Dukes of Clarence and Cumberland, and the Prince and Princess of Orange; after whom came the company who were invited to dinner. The royal party dined in the temporary room; and for the accommodation of the nobility, three tents adjoining to this apartment were pitched in a direct line, so that their majesties had a complete view of the whole assembly. The dinner, consisting of every delicacy of the season, was served up in great style; and during the repast the band of the Stafford militia played several martial airs. As soon as dinner was over, the Princess Elizabeth conducted her royal parents and the visitors to the grotto, where some of the principal vocal performers entertained them with glees and songs. The company then proceeded across the lawn to another part of the gardens, where a group, in the character of gypsies, made their appearance; and on the approach of their majesties, Mrs. Mills, who personated the queen of the vagrant tribe, advanced from behind a thicket, leading an ass bearing two children, and sang a gypsey song; after which she delivered her poetical destinies of good fortune to the several members of the royal family. The King and the royal dukes took great notice of the two children placed on the ass, and His Majesty desired that they might be led round for the Queen to see them, as they belonged to two of the soldiers' wives. Mrs. Mills and her gypsey throng having concluded their part with a dance, retreated into the thicket; after which the princess led the way to a space of ground near what is called the Hermit's Cell, where a stage was erected, on which one Du Crow, termed the Flemish Hercules, exhibited his wonderful performances on the slack wire, and afterwards his extraordinary powers of strength, such as balancing on his chin three large coach-wheels, also a ladder, to which were affixed two chairs with two children on them, and bearing at the same time on his hands and feet a table in the form of a pyramid, with eight persons on its surface.

When these exploits were over, the company walked towards the canal, where a large boat, having the royal standard flying, was placed on the stocks, to represent the Royal Sovereign ready for launching. Here Mrs. Mills appeared in the dress of a sailor, while Mr. Fawcett, in that of the St. James's association, delivered a loyal address. On the return of their majesties to the lawn in front of the grotto, six Hungarian hussars performed the peculiar dances of their country; after which, Fawcett entertained the company with a humorous song, on the conclusion of which the company repaired to the Princess Elizabeth's Thatched Barn. In this beautiful arbour, which was fitted up for a ball-room, seats were erected for the accommodation of six hundred of the nobility, who were invited by tickets from Her Majesty, none others being admitted. The entrance consisted of arched colonnades of crystal lamps; the room was decorated with flowers, and lighted up with chandeliers in the form of a bee-hive, the upper part suspended by a tassel resembling ears of corn. The ball lasted till twelve o'clock, when their majesties returned to Windsor; and the rest of the company, after partaking of a cold collation, soon followed.

At the end of the month the royal family made their annual visit to Weymouth, where they remained till the beginning of October, enjoying the benefits of bathing, and mingling in the amusements of the numerous visitors who were attracted by the presence of majesty to that gay and pleasant watering-place. Here, on the second day of their arrival, they were met on the Esplanade by some quakers, who accosted His Majesty, and requested leave to introduce a young member of their society from America, and who, they said, was extremely desirous of seeing the King. The good-natured monarch accordingly entered into conversation with the stranger, who then retired to a little distance, and taking off his hat, offered up a long prayer for the King of the little island, blessing providence for his late deliverance, and supplicating on his behalf a prolongation of years for the good of his people. The scene was interesting, and much affected the persons who witnessed it, particularly the Queen and her daughters.

Weymouth was never more thronged since it became a place of royal notice than at this season, and their majesties appeared to make it their study to render the residence there as pleasant to others as it was to themselves.

They regularly visited the rooms, seldom missed the theatre in the evening, and made frequent excursions on the water, there being constantly one or more vessels of war stationed in the roads during their stay. The principal families in the neighbourhood received occasional calls, but quite in a friendly way; and they, in turn, were invited to the Queen's parties at the Lodge. At this time the Prince of Wales and his interesting child were at Weymouth, a circumstance which contributed very much to the general liveliness.

Among the various spots to which the royal curiosity was drawn in these periodical tours, the Isle of Portland came in for a considerable share of attention, on account of the shells, pebbles, and fossils, found in the sands and the cavities of the rocks. The children in consequence made it their business to search for these natural rarities, for which they were certain of a liberal compensation, whenever the Queen and princesses made their annual visit to the island.

At the beginning of October the royal family left the coast for Windsor, where Her Majesty kept the Christmas-day following in a very pleasing manner. Sixty poor families had a substantial dinner given them; and in the evening the children of the principal families in the neighbourhood were invited to an entertainment at the Lodge. Here, among other amusing objects for the gratification of the juvenile visitors, in the middle of the room stood an immense tub with a yew-tree placed in it, from the branches of which hung bunches of sweetmeats, almonds, and raisins, in papers, fruits, and toys, most tastefully arranged, and the whole illuminated by small wax candles. After the company had walked round and admired the tree, each child obtained a portion of the sweets which it bore, together with a toy; and then all returned home quite delighted.

CHAPTER XXI.

Commencement of the Nineteenth Century.—King's Illness.—Relieved by a simple Remedy.—Royal Visits.—Weymouth.—Anecdote of the Queen.—Fête at Frogmore.—New Year, and Peace, 1802.—Celebration of the Queen's Birth-Day at Constantinople.—Christening of Lord Chesterfield's Daughter.—War renewed.—Installation of Knights of the Bath.—Military Reviews.—Presentation of Colours.—Queen's Birth-Day, 1804.—Alarming State of the King's Health.—Recovery.—Tour to Weymouth.—Aquatic Amusements.—Splendid Entertainments.—Visit to Mr. Rose.—Royal Reconciliation.—Translation of Freylinghausen.

THE commencement of the new century diffused cheerfulness over the country; and the anniversary return of the day appointed to be kept as Her Majesty's birth-day was celebrated in consequence with peculiar splendour, the performance of the ode for the new year being reserved till that great court festival. But pleasure and pain are nearly allied; and within a few weeks after this scene of gaiety, the royal family were greatly distressed by the alarming state of the King, whose illness threatened very serious consequences, particularly as none of the regular medicines administered could induce repose. In this emergency, when professional skill was baffled, the casual observation of Mr. Addington, now Lord Sidmouth, upon the virtue of a pillow of hops, was fortunately acted upon, and had the effect of relieving the royal sufferer from his malady. To this circumstance Mr. Addington was indebted for the jocular title of doctor, which, though bestowed in the spirit of party, he was well content to bear on an occasion so gratifying to his own feelings and those of his sovereign, whose sense of the benefit he had received was expressed by a friendly visit paid to that gentleman at Wimbledon, the day before the royal family left Kew for the coast.

On the twenty-ninth of June their majesties and the princesses went to Cuffnells, the seat of Mr. Rose, where they remained three days, and then embarked for Weymouth, which place they did not reach till twelve o'clock at night, owing to contrary winds; and when they landed, there were no persons in attendance to receive them at the pier or on the beach, so that they were obliged to walk without any escort to the lodge.

During the royal residence at Weymouth this season, the Queen gave, as usual, a splendid entertainment at Radipole, but on a more extended scale, under her own immediate direction and that of the Princess Elizabeth. Among the persons employed in the decorations was the wife of Mr. William Penlëy, one of the performers belonging to the Theatre at Weymouth; and while she was thus engaged, her little boy attracted the particular notice of the Queen, who was so pleased with the liveliness of his parts, that she sent him to an eminent school at Sherborne, where he remained solely at her charge till he had completed his seventeenth year, when a commission in the army was bestowed upon him, with three hundred guineas for an outfit.

Their majesties returned from this western excursion at the beginning of October, and closed the year with a brilliant entertainment at Frogmore, to which only a select party of the nobility and gentry in that neighbourhood were invited.

With the new year, 1802, came in the charm of peace, which spread a radiance over the celebration of the Queen's birth-day, and rendered the circle more gay and numerous than it had been for a considerable time. That annual festival, however, was commemorated at Constantinople in a manner more pleasing to the feelings of humanity, than in the formal sound of presentations and congratulatory compliments.

The Ottoman government having directed that a palace should be erected for the accommodation of the English ambassador, Lord Elgin, then our minister at that court, fixed upon this day for the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the intended building. The spectacle was grand; but what rendered it peculiarly and unspeakably touching, was the circumstance of the liberation of one hundred and forty Christian slaves, who were presented to the ambassador by the capitan pacha, in honour of the Queen of England.

On the second of April their majesties and the Princess Elizabeth stood sponsors in person to the infant daughter of the Earl of Chesterfield, at his house in May Fair. The Dowager-Marchioness of Bath acted as chief nurse, and presented the child to the Queen, who delivered it into the hands of Dr. Sutton, Bishop of Norwich, giving it the name of Georgiana. After the ceremony, the Earl of Chesterfield, on his knee, presented a cup of caudle to the King on a gold waiter of great value, which had been given to his ancestor, the first Lord Stanhope, by the King of Spain, for services in that country, during the war of the succession.

The remainder of this year passed without any remarkable occurrences in the royal family, and the next had scarcely begun, before the hoarse note of preparation for war was heard, the formal declaration of which took place on the eighteenth of May. The very day afterwards a grand spectacle was exhibited in the installation of Knights of the Bath, at which the Duke of York presided as great master. This grand chivalric ceremony was viewed by Her Majesty and the princesses from a box lined with crimson, over Congreve's monument in the Abbey; and as the knights passed in procession, they halted to pay their obeisance, the whole of the company in the nave of the church standing up, which had a very fine effect.

The Queen and her daughters were all dressed in white, as were most of the ladies present. After the procession the royal party retired to the deanry, where an elegant entertainment was prepared for their refreshment.

The renewal of the war, though it portended an arduous struggle, so far from being attended with any damp of the national spirit, seemed to have the contrary effect of rousing the whole mass of population into energy. Of this, a striking proof was given in the alacrity with which the volunteers flew to arms; and a prouder day perhaps was hardly ever witnessed than at the end of October, when His Majesty reviewed these loyal troops in Hyde Park. On that occasion the scene was rendered peculiarly interesting, by the appearance of the French princes and several of their faithful adherents, in uniform, who joined in the royal train, no doubt with mingled emotions of anxiety, admiration, and gratitude. Her Majesty, with the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, followed the King in one open landau, as the Princesses Sophia and Mary did in another. The review lasted from about ten o'clock till half-past one, when the royal party, with the foreign princes and several officers, proceeded to Buckingham House, accompanied all the way by immense crowds of people, who, being no longer restrained by the military, ran in all directions to catch a sight of their venerable sovereign. The air resounded with shouts; and His Majesty shewed the sense which he entertained of these expressions of loyalty, by repeatedly taking off his hat, and giving other signs of his grateful feelings. The whole number of persons, together with the volunteers, could not be less than two hundred thousand; and many came to town from a distance of above one hundred miles, purposely to have a sight of this splendid array. Two days afterwards, there was another review of the Westminster, Lambeth, and Surrey volunteers, which fell very little short of the former in grandeur and general effect.

On the fourth of January, 1804, a brilliant scene was displayed at Ranelagh, in the presentation of colours to the Queen's royal volunteers. About noon, the trumpet announced the arrival of the courtly party in three of His Majesty's carriages, followed by others belonging to different noblemen. The company having alighted, Lady Harrington was conducted to her box by the vice chamberlain, and followed by her attendants, exactly in the same manner as the Queen would have been. She was dressed in a black pelisse and a scarlet sash, with a velvet hat highly ornamented; and an antique necklace of great value, with a fine cameo of His Majesty, being a large and beautiful onyx, set as a medallion, which was presented to her ladyship by the Queen, as a memorial of the event. The countess being seated, two pairs of colours were introduced, and placed on each side of the royal box. The King's colours of each regiment consisted of a plain union standard; but the regimental one, which was designed and executed by the Queen and princesses, was a superb piece of needle-work, the ground being a rich purple silk, having in the centre Her Majesty's arms, embroidered and surrounded with sprigs of variegated tints and figures. At the lower corners were the letters C. R. and under the armorial bearings the words, "Queen's Royal Volunteers."

After prayers and a suitable discourse, the Countess of Harrington thus addressed the officers:

"Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty having been graciously pleased to confer upon me the honour of presenting to you these colours, I am anxious to express how highly I am flattered by this distinguished mark of the Queen's favour. At a time of all others the most awful, when our country is threatened with the unprovoked attack of a most implacable enemy, and when you have evinced your readiness to stand forward in the defence of every thing that is most dear, to us all, what can be more gratifying or more honourable to you, than being peculiarly distinguished by Her Majesty, and receiving your colours from her? Animated as your hearts must be in gratitude to the Queen, in addition to every other noble sentiment that has guided you from the moment of the first offer of your services, it would not only be superfluous, but presumptuous in me, to add anything more upon the occasion than the expression of every fervent wish for your success in the event of the enemy carrying his threats into execution; confident that no power, however strenuously exerted, will ever wrest these colours from you, while there is yet left a man in your corps to defend them."

To this neat and energetic speech a suitable answer was returned by Lord Hobart, who expressed in behalf of the corps, which had thus been honoured, the most patriotic and grateful sentiments.

The festival commemorative of the Queen's birthday was observed this season with the usual demonstrations of respect. In the morning the whole family breakfasted together, according to custom on these occasions; but the King did not attend the drawing-room, owing to a severe attack of the rheumatism; in consequence of which, Her Majesty, instead of a ball, gave a concert in the evening at Buckingham House, to a numerous party of the nobility. The disorder with which the King was afflicted assumed such an alarming aspect in the middle of the following month, as to prevent his constant attendance of three physicians for several days, after which two others were called in.

the public anxiety was excited to the utmost degree of distress by the unfavourable reports that were in circulation. By the end of the month, however, the violent symptoms were so far abated, that a prayer of thanksgiving was judiciously drawn up, and ordered to be read in churches, for the purpose of quieting the fears of the people; and, at length, the discontinuance of the official bulletins confirmed the hopes of the nation in the complete restoration of the King's health.

On the twenty-fourth of August, the royal family and attendants left the Queen's Lodge for Weymouth, proceeding by Binfield and Wokingham to the seat of Sir William Pitt, at Heckfield Heath, where they dined. Having taken coffee, they went on to Andover, and stopped for tea and supper at the Star and Garter. His Majesty appeared in excellent spirits, and handed the Queen out of the carriage with the greatest gallantry, cautioning her against the number of steps. During the short stay of the royal visitors, they became particularly attached to a beautiful infant about three months old, with whose charms the princesses were extremely delighted. About half-past ten o'clock, all the party, except the Duke of Cambridge, set off for Weymouth, which place they reached at five the next morning, when they immediately retired to rest, having travelled all night. His Majesty, however, rose soon after seven, and having taken breakfast, walked on the Esplanade, then proceeded to inspect the stables, mounted his saddle-horse, and rode out till his usual hour of dinner. In the evening the whole town was illuminated; fire-works were let off on board the ships as well as on the Esplanade; the place was full of gaiety, and no lodgings could be obtained at any price. The renovated state of the King diffused joy among all classes; and they who had close and constant opportunities of beholding him and his happy family were enraptured with his condescension. In his walks he conversed with the farmer on agricultural affairs, with the soldier on his military duties, and with the sailor on the boasted preparations of the enemy. The last subject never failed to draw from him some pleasing remarks on the superiority of the navy; and one day, when going off to the yacht, an attendant in waiting, in delivering a musical instrument to a man belonging to the barge, told him to take care of it, on which the King turned round and said, "Oh! there is no occasion for that caution, every thing is safe in the hands of a British seaman."

On the third of September the royal family and a large company embarked for the Isle of Portland, famous for its quarries and romantic scenery. The barge had the royal standard in her stern, and an awning covered with beautiful silk, large enough to shade the whole party, but sufficiently open on the sides to give the numerous spectators in the surrounding boats a complete view of their majesties as they passed. Great preparations had been making for several days before at Portland Castle, for the entertainment of the royal guests; and every delicacy of the season was conveyed over from the King's kitchen at Weymouth. A large platform was raised for the royal family to land upon at the beach, and the carriages and horses were taken over in the ferry-boat.

Soon after their landing, Her Majesty and the princesses, in two carriages, and the King with his suite on horseback, took a most delightful excursion almost round the island; and on their return to the castle, sat down to a sumptuous dinner, during which the inhabitants crowded from all parts to see their sovereign. Shortly after dinner, the whole party went on board the yacht, took several trips in the offing, and returned to Weymouth time enough for the theatre, which they rarely ever missed.

The ninth being the anniversary of the wedding of their majesties, the same was celebrated with a grand fête, under the direction of the Princess Elizabeth. The King appeared first at the rooms; and about two o'clock the Queen, and the rest of the family arrived, with a numerous company of the nobility. The tables were set out in a style of the greatest elegance; and about three the dancing commenced. All the roads leading to Weymouth were thronged with carriages, post-chaises, and every kind of conveyance, so great was the desire of the people to see the monarch.

The inhabitants of Weymouth were much amused by a succession of fêtes during the residence of the royal family on the coast this season ; but the most curious of all these entertainments was an aquatic one, in honour of the birth-day of the Duchess of Wirtemberg, on the twenty-ninth of September ; at which above two hundred and fifty persons were invited. The royal yachts were moored in the harbour for this purpose ; and while their majesties, with the princes and princesses, dined on board one, a numerous party did the same on board the other ; there being platforms laid, by which an easy communication was maintained between the two vessels. After dinner a Dutch fair was held, both in the yachts and on shore, marquees and booths being erected for the several dealers. The whole had a most lively appearance, and infinitely surpassed any of those ridiculous shews called masquerades.

On the tenth of October the royal family visited Lord Dorchester, at Milton Abbey, from whence they went the next day to view Stalbridge, the seat of the Earl of Uxbridge, but which had not been inhabited by that nobleman for a number of years. After inspecting this ancient and deserted place, the party returned to the abbey ; but in going up a very steep hill, two of the horses in a phaeton got entangled together, which caused the carriage to overset; and the two princesses who were in it fell out, but happily without receiving any other injury than that of being greatly frightened. The royal family remained at Milton Abbey till the thirteenth, when they returned to Weymouth, His Majesty on horseback, and the Queen and princesses, in carriages.

Early in the morning of the twenty-ninth of the same month, their majesties and family left Weymouth on a visit to Mr. Rose in Hampshire, previous to their return to Windsor. After breakfasting with Mr. Drax Grosvenor at Charborough, they proceeded to Wimbourne, and there changed horses; but the town was so crowded with volunteers and visitors, that the royal carriages could scarcely pass along. The windows were filled with ladies elegantly dressed, and all the tops of the houses were covered, such was the eagerness of the country-people to get a sight of the King and Queen. From hence their majesties went on to Ringwood, where a similar scene presented itself, and so it continued all the way to Lyndhurst, where the volunteers from Southampton and other places were assembled. Numbers came from such a distance that they travelled in flying waggons; and the streets in every town through which they passed were filled with coaches, chaises, gigs, carts, and an immense concourse of horse and foot travellers. The royal family reached Cuffnells soon after four the same afternoon, and immediately sat down to a sumptuous dinner, which had been provided in expectation of their arrival.

On the first of November the corporation of Southampton were honoured with a royal visit. The King entered the town on horseback, but the Queen and princesses went in carriages, and were received in the audit room by the mayor and his brethren. A loyal address was then read to their majesties by the recorder, to which the King returned a most gracious answer, expressive of his particular attachment to the town of Southampton, having been, as he said, a member of the corporation from his infancy. After this ceremony, the royal family went to dine with Mr. Bulkeley, in the New Forest.

The next morning their majesties left Cuffnells, with many kind expressions of satisfaction to the worthy owner of that hospitable mansion and his family, and proceeded amidst the blessings of a numerous assemblage of spectators to Farnham Castle, the palace of the Bishop of Winchester, where an elegant dinner was provided for their entertainment. About four o'clock they took leave of the bishop, and soon after six reached Windsor, to the great joy of the inhabitants, who illuminated their houses on the happy return of the royal family.

To heighten the gladness occasioned by the renovation of the King's health, an interview took place between His Majesty and the heir-apparent, on the twelfth of this month, at Kew Palace. The Queen and princesses were present at this interesting and most touching scene, which was marked by every emotion of paternal kindness on the one part, and of the most profound veneration on the other. Her Majesty had long felt and deplored this unhappy breach and separation: but all her efforts to bring about a reconciliation were ineffectual, till the recent illness and recovery of the sovereign gave her those opportunities of which she knew how to avail herself for the accomplishment of an object that was the nearest to her heart.

Another proof of Her Majesty's piety and maternal attention appeared this year, in the publication of a volume at her expense, from the new stereotype press of the late Lord Stanhope, being the first work printed by that improved system. This book, which is an imperial octavo, has for its title, "An Abstract of the whole Doctrine of the Christian Religion, with observations, by John Anastatius Freylinghausen, Minister of St. Ulric's Church, and Inspector of the Public School at Halle, in Germany. From a manuscript in Her Majesty's possession."

The work was never printed in its original language; but the Queen highly valued the manuscript, which she made the basis of her lessons of instruction when teaching her daughters; and having caused it to be translated, she desired the late Dr. Porteus, Bishop of London, to revise it for publication, in the hopes that it would be of service to young persons as an elementary book, exhibiting a concise and comprehensive view of the whole system of Christianity. The doctrinal part is perfectly orthodox, and as completely free from any peculiarity of sentiment as the practical division is from enthusiastic flights or mystical reveries.

It is remarkable, however, that the editor of Bishop Porteus's works, and the writer of his life, should not have taken any notice of the concern which that prelate had in the arrangement and publication of the book. This extraordinary silence is no more respectful to the memory of the bishop than to the high character of his illustrious patroness. The preface to the work sufficiently shews his lordship's opinion of its merits; and, therefore, his biographer ought to have noticed the share which he had in the publication. There may be a reason for this strange neglect; but if there is, it must be one of a private nature, since to have assisted the Queen in the promulgation of religious knowledge cannot be considered otherwise than as redounding to the honour of the bishop. In the judgment of another prelate, indeed, the performance was far from being deserving of the distinction which it received. But the censures passed by Bishop Watson upon a treatise of orthodox divinity will not weigh much with those who have seen that political ecclesiastic magnifying a garbled version of the New Testament, published for the avowed purpose of supporting and propagating Socinianism. A theological work, esteemed by the Queen, and revised by Bishop Porteus, was not likely to meet with the approbation of such a man as the late Bishop of Llandaff, who, by his own account, had no other predilection for the church of England than a most hearty desire to attain her highest honours and possess her richest temporalities.

CHAPTER XXII.

Magnificent Fête given by the King at Windsor Castle.—The Queen's Breakfast at Frogmore.—Installation of Knights of the Garter.—Splendid Celebration of Her Majesty's Birth-Day.—German Theatricals.—Royal Tour to Weymouth.—Death of the Duke of Gloucester.

WHEN the royal family went to reside at Windsor Castle, the King formed the resolution of giving what has been generally termed among good old English customs a house-warming: but the execution of this design was delayed from time to time, till the beginning of the year 1805, when it was carried into effect in a most splendid manner. This fête might be truly called regal, as every thing was done by the direction and under the superintendence of His Majesty, from the preparations of the rooms to the arrangements for the company. While Mr. Wyatt was fitting up the works, the King was giving his orders in every department. The new service of plate prepared for the occasion cost between twenty and thirty thousand pounds, and the whole collection displayed at this festive scene was supposed to be the most magnificent in Europe. A number of persons were employed for a considerable time preceding, in hanging the silver chandeliers and other ornaments that had been saved from the French ravagers in Hanover. Glass chandeliers and lustres, to the value of several thousand pounds, were also purposely prepared in London; and no expense was spared to render this a truly royal banquet. Three hundred and ninety persons of distinction were invited, besides the royal family, ministers, and officers of state. Different cards were issued for the concert and ball. The company at the former consisted of about one hundred and fifty. The five trumpeters belonging to the Oxford Blues were stationed in the gallery, on the first flight of stairs, in their full superb gold-lace uniform, and played God save the King, in parts, when any of the royal family entered, which had a very grand effect. As the company proceeded into the castle, they were introduced into the presence-chamber by the pages, the same as on a court-day; and after paying their respects to their majesties, they went round to view the apartments, the appearance of which filled every eye with astonishment.

At eight o'clock the concert began in the Queen's anti-chamber, adjoining the ball-room. The performance, under the direction of Mr. Rogers, was the oratorio of Esther; the instrumental parts consisted principally of Her Majesty's band, who attended in a balcony near the guard room, in their full dresses. The music ended about ten o'clock, when the ball commenced, which was led off by the Duke of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta. The floor, instead of being chalked, was painted with fanciful and appropriate devices by an eminent artist. The attention of the company was chiefly arrested by the novel appearance of four silver tables, between the windows, two of which came from Hanover, and had been beautified for the occasion. One of the other two was presented by the corporation of London to King William, and the second by the same body to Queen Anne. The magnificent effect of these massy pieces of plate was considerably heightened by four elegant pier glasses, one over each table, with silver frames. These also came from Hanover. At the fire-places were four large beautiful dogs of solid silver, for burning wood instead of coals, and similar to those used in the time of Henry the Eighth. Cards were played in several rooms. Dancing concluded a few minutes before two, when supper was announced. Their majesties, and the different branches of the family, supped in the guard-room, at a table which was elevated upon a temporary platform, raised about nine inches from the floor, for the purpose of enabling the royal family to behold their company with the greater ease, and also to gratify the curiosity of their guests. Two tables were laid on each side of the room, each holding about sixty persons.

The plate on the royal table was wholly of gold; and nothing but silver was used at the other tables. The beautiful damask cloths which covered the tables had the royal arms woven in them, with tasteful and elegant borders; but what rendered them peculiarly attractive was the circumstance that they were entirely of the workmanship of the princesses. Eighty of the young gentlemen of Eton school were present; and it is a fact, that the King went to the college himself purposely to invite them to the entertainment. They supped in the grand hall upon the ground floor. The number of persons present at the supper could not be less than five hundred. A little after nine o'clock, the princess Charlotte of Wales retired with her governess, Lady de Clifford, and the rest of the royal family withdrew about half-past three in the morning; but the company did not leave the castle till past six. Her Majesty's private rooms were illuminated with beautiful Egyptian lustres; and there were also between five and six hundred silver branches for lights hung in various parts of the royal building. At supper upwards of two hundred and fifty dozen of silver plates were used, and a similar number of silver knives and forks.

Ostrich feathers, to the number of eight or nine, were universally worn by the ladies, and diamonds in profusion; and taste was stretched to the utmost in the invention of new dresses for this magnificent entertainment, the expense of which was estimated at fifty thousand pounds. The next day Her Majesty gave a grand public breakfast at Frogmore, which was attended by about two hundred persons of the first distinction, who were waited upon by the royal servants in full dress liveries. About three o'clock dancing commenced, which continued till a little after six, when the company sat down to an elegant collation.

Windsor exhibited another scene of royal splendour on Tuesday, the twenty-third of April, being St. George's day, in the grand ceremony of the installation of knights of the garter.

During the whole of the preceding day, the road from London was covered with one continued line of carriages; many of which had six horses, and several outriders. This sight naturally drew together an immense number of spectators from the neighbouring villages to the towns through which they passed. The greatest difficulty was experienced in obtaining a change of horses, and in some instances the nobility were obliged to get out and walk a considerable distance.

It was His Majesty's particular wish that as many of the old customs should be kept up as possible, conformably with which he gave directions that a baron of beef should be procured, which was accordingly done. It was cut nearly in the form of a saddle of mutton, weighed one hundred and sixty-two pounds, and took ten hours in roasting.

Tuesday morning was ushered in with the ringing of bells, and soon after seven o'clock the royal horse guards marched from their barracks opposite the grand entrance to the castle, where a pair of silver kettle drums having been previously placed, His Majesty came to the door, and addressing the colonel, said, "I present these to you as a mark of my esteem for the good conduct of the regiment upon all occasions." The colonel then delivered a written address of thanks to His Majesty on behalf of the regiment; after which, a corporal lifted the drums upon a grey horse, on which a black was preparing to beat them, when the band, consisting of eight trumpets, struck up "God save the King," concluding with a royal salute, and then returned playing "Britons strike Home," as they passed through the town.

The ceremony of the procession and installation lasted from eleven in the morning till five in the afternoon, when the sovereign and the knights returned from the chapel to St. George's Hall, where a most sumptuous dinner was served up in all the formal grandeur of the days of chivalry.

The preparations for this splendid festival were upon the grandest scale, and executed with extraordinary elegance and rapidity. In the chapel, where alone seats could be obtained by tickets, places were assigned for spectators in the three aisles, and within the screen; but particular visitors had others allotted them in the organ-loft, the Queen's closet, and the chamberlain's gallery. On the north side of the altar, a temporary gallery, surmounted by a canopy of crimson velvet with a gold fringe, was erected for the Queen and princesses; and on the opposite side was another for the lord chamberlain, officers of state, foreign ambassadors, and ladies of distinction. The banners of the knights were all suspended over the stalls, and above them their respective helmets, crests, and armorial bearings. Exclusive of the knights' banquet in the hall, entertainments were also given in the castle to the nobility and gentry, military officers, and others. The chief of them was in the audience-chamber of Her Majesty, where the concert was given at the late grand fête. It contained three tables, set out in the most beautiful variety and taste for the ladies; the Dowager-Marchioness of Bath, with the Countesses Cardigan and Harcourt, doing the honours to the Queen's guests. The female branches of the royal family dined with Her Majesty in another apartment.

The nineteenth of May being the real birth-day of the Queen, when she completed her sixty-second year, was ushered in with the ringing of bells at Windsor. In the course of the day, the Prince of Wales, and the whole of the royal family, paid their saddle of mutton, weighed one hundred and sixty-two pounds, and took ten hours in roasting.

Tuesday morning was ushered in with the ringing of bells, and soon after seven o'clock the royal horse guards marched from their barracks opposite the grand entrance to the castle, where a pair of silver kettle drums having been previously placed, His Majesty came to the door, and addressing the colonel, said, "I present these to you as a mark of my esteem for the good conduct of the regiment upon all occasions." The colonel then delivered a written address of thanks to His Majesty on behalf of the regiment; after which, a corporal lifted the drums upon a grey horse, on which a black was preparing to beat them, when the band, consisting of eight trumpets, struck up "God save the King," concluding with a royal salute, and then returned playing "Britons strike Home," as they passed through the town.

The ceremony of the procession and installation lasted from eleven in the morning till five in the afternoon, when the sovereign and the knights returned from the chapel to St. George's Hall, where a most sumptuous dinner was served up in all the formal grandeur of the days of chivalry.

The preparations for this splendid festival were upon the grandest scale, and executed with extraordinary elegance and rapidity. In the chapel, where alone seats could be obtained by tickets, places were assigned for spectators in the three aisles, and within the screen; but particular visitors had others allotted them in the organ-loft, the Queen's closet, and the chamberlain's gallery. On the north side of the altar, a temporary gallery, surmounted by a canopy of crimson velvet with a gold fringe, was erected for the Queen and princesses; and on the opposite side was another for the lord chamberlain, officers of state, foreign ambassadors, and ladies of distinction. The banners of the knights were all suspended over the stalls, and above them their respective helmets, crests, and armorial bearings. Exclusive of the knights' banquet in the hall, entertainments were also given in the castle to the nobility and gentry, military officers, and others. The chief of them was in the audience-chamber of Her Majesty, where the concert was given at the late grand fête. It contained three tables, set out in the most beautiful variety and taste for the ladies; the Dowager-Marchioness of Bath, with the Countesses Cardigan and Harcourt, doing the honours to the Queen's guests. The female branches of the royal family dined with Her Majesty in another apartment.

The nineteenth of May being the real birth-day of the Queen, when she completed her sixty-second year, was ushered in with the ringing of bells at Windsor. In the course of the day, the Prince of Wales, and the whole of the royal family, paid their sa idle of mutton, weighed one hundred and sixty-two pounds, and took ten hours in roasting.

Tuesday morning was ushered in with the ringing of bells, and soon after seven o'clock the royal horse guards marched from their barracks opposite the grand entrance to the castle, where a pair of silver kettle drums having been previously placed, His Majesty came to the door, and addressing the colonel, said, "I present these to you as a mark of my esteem for the good conduct of the regiment upon all occasions." The colonel then delivered a written address of thanks to His Majesty on behalf of the regiment; after which, a corporal lifted the drums upon a grey horse, on which a black was preparing to beat them, when the band, consisting of eight trumpets, struck up "God save the King," concluding with a royal salute, and then returned playing "Britons strike Home," as they passed through the town.

The ceremony of the procession and installation lasted from eleven in the morning till five in the afternoon, when the sovereign and the knights returned from the chapel to St. George's Hall, where a most sumptuous dinner was served up in all the formal grandeur of the days of chivalry.

The preparations for this splendid festival were upon the grandest scale, and executed with extraordinary elegance and rapidity. In the chapel, where alone seats could be obtained by tickets, places were assigned for spectators in the three aisles, and within the screen; but particular visitors had others allotted them in the organ-loft, the Queen's closet, and the chamberlain's gallery. On the north side of the altar, a temporary gallery, surmounted by a canopy of crimson velvet with a gold fringe, was erected for the Queen and princesses; and on the opposite side was another for the lord chamberlain, officers of state, foreign ambassadors, and ladies of distinction. The banners of the knights were all suspended over the stalls, and above them their respective helmets, crests, and armorial bearings. Exclusive of the knights' banquet in the hall, entertainments were also given in the castle to the nobility and gentry, military officers, and others. The chief of them was in the audience-chamber of Her Majesty, where the concert was given at the late grand fête. It contained three tables, set out in the most beautiful variety and taste for the ladies; the Dowager-Marchioness of Bath, with the Countesses Cardigan and Harcourt, doing the honours to the Queen's guests. The female branches of the royal family dined with Her Majesty in another apartment.

The nineteenth of May being the real birth-day of the Queen, when she completed her sixty-second year, was ushered in with the ringing of bells at Windsor. In the course of the day, the Prince of Wales, and the whole of the royal family, paid their respects to Her Majesty; but the celebration of the anniversary, on account of its happening on a Sunday, was deferred till Monday, when it was observed with great splendour. Such of the company as came in the morning from London and different parts of the country dined at the equerries' tables; and about seven in the evening the whole began to assemble in considerable numbers. At the top of the stairs they were ushered into the royal apartments by the pages, dressed according to the Windsor uniform.

A little before nine, their majesties, the princesses, and other members of the royal family, entered the ball-room; and soon after the oratorio of Athaliah commenced, at the conclusion of which the dancing began, and was continued with great vivacity till two o'clock in the morning, when the company withdrew to a sumptuous supper in St. George's Hall. The royal family sat at a table under the throne; two large stools, covered with crimson velvet, being placed for their majesties' feet. The table was upon a temporary platform, covered with green cloth, three steps higher than the floor of the room, down the sides of which were laid two tables, one accommodating seventy-six, and the other seventy-seven persons. In the adjoining elegant room, called the King's guard-chamber, two long tables were also laid, each holding eighty-six persons. The ground-work for the whole of the ornaments consisted of various coloured sand, displaying the most beautiful dévises, emblematical of the occasion ; and having the semblance of highly coloured drawings. Along the sides of the boards on which the sand was displayed were numerous trinkets for the company. The silver dogs and tables that had been used at the King's entertainment were again exhibited. In another part of the castle, tables were laid for one hundred and fourteen young Etonians, but every thing was cold, and no chairs were allowed in this room.

The following day Her Majesty gave a curious entertainment at Frogmore, consisting of two German musical pieces of a comic description. The characters were performed by two German girls and two German boys ; and one of the latter was so extremely humorous, as to produce bursts of laughter even from those who did not understand the language. This exhibition took place in the building called the Barn, which was often fitted up as a temporary theatre. There were three scenes, which, with the stage and decorations, were prepared by an artist from London. A box was erected in front for their majesties and the princesses. About fifty persons of quality sat in the pit ; and along the sides seats were placed for the accommodation of the principal inhabitants of Windsor. Their majesties were much pleased with the performances of the juvenile actors, particularly with the boy who personated a country barber and school-master. Tea and lemonade were served round to the royal party and their visitors in the intervals of the performance, at the conclusion of which an abundance of wine and cake was distributed to the rest of the company.

In the same spirit of condescending generosity, the Queen gave a sumptuous dinner shortly afterwards to the Windsor volunteers, for whose accommodation tents were erected in the grounds at Frogmore, and in the evening the German theatricals were repeated.

On the breaking up of parliament, their majesties and the princesses went to Weymouth, where they spent their time in the usual manner; but a damp was thrown upon their enjoyments, and the gaiety of the place, by the death of the Duke of Gloucester in August, which event, though naturally to have been expected, from the declining state of his health, was sensibly felt by their majesties and the whole royal family. The people of Weymouth also were much concerned at the loss of the duke, whom they considered in some measure as one of their principal patrons, not only by his frequent residence among them, but by his being the means of bringing the King acquainted with the beauties of the place.

At first it was intended that the remains of his royal highness should be deposited with those of his ancestors in Westminster Abbey; but after the requisite preparations had been made for that purpose, contrary orders came from His Majesty, and the interment took place in the new vault at Windsor, being the first body laid in that sepulchral mansion, which our venerable monarch caused to be set apart for himself and his family: thus, in the midst of health, mindful of the last stage of all earthly grandeur, when, in the language of the poet, it will be found that

The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things.
There is no armour 'gainst our fate:
Death lays his icy hand on Kings.
Sceptres and crowns must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal laid
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Defect in the King's Sight.—His Majesty's Birth-Day, 1806.—Inquiry into the Conduct of the Princess of Wales.—Prudence and Generosity of the Queen.—Melancholy aspect of Public Affairs.—The Queen's Birth-Day, 1807.—Return of the Princess of Wales to Court.—Arrival of the Duchess of Brunswick.—Parliamentary Settlement of Frogmore on the Queen.—Description of the House and Grounds.—Her Majesty's Library and Printing Press.

THOUGH the year 1806 opened with the promise of felicity to the royal family, in the renovated state of the King's health, and the improvement of his sight to a degree that enabled him to discern minute objects at table, and distinguish persons at a short distance, the aspect of things, public, and private, soon assumed a gloomy cast. As the summer advanced, the complaint in His Majesty's eyes increased ; in consequence of which, the fatigue of the drawing-room on his birth-day devolved wholly upon the Queen. In the morning, as usual, the royal dukes breakfasted with their august relatives ; and at about half-past twelve the Queen and princesses left Buckingham House for St. James's, with the customary escort, but at so quick a rate, that two of the horses belonging to the life guards fell, and threw their riders; on which, Her Majesty gave directions that for the future her carriages should not be driven with such velocity.

After the royal party had taken some refreshment, and dressed for the drawing-room, the Archbishop of Canterbury was introduced into the private apartment of the Queen, to whom he delivered a congratulatory oration on the happy return of the day. The concourse of visitors who were by this time assembled in the adjoining room was so great that the attendants had much difficulty in making a clear passage: Soon after Her Majesty had entered the room, the lord chamberlain waved his wand, as a signal for the performance of the birth-day ode, the music to which was wholly taken from Handel. This annual offering being finished, Her Majesty continued to receive the company in her wonted affable manner till near five o'clock, when she found herself so extremely overpowered and fatigued as to be under the necessity of retiring, to the great disappointment of numbers who had been in waiting for presentation a considerable time, but were prevented from getting forward through the pressure of the fashionable crowd.

The exclusion of the Princess of Wales from court, and the appointment of a committee to investigate certain particulars of her conduct, raised public curiosity to the height of impatience at this time, and the secrecy of the inquiry did not fail to furnish the tongue of scandal with matter of malignant insinuation against Her Majesty, as having taken a part in the persecution of unprotected innocence. Into the circumstances of the immediate case to which the attention of the commissioners was directed, or the particulars of the evidence adduced on the occasion, it would be needless here to enter, but the ends of justice require it to be observed, that so far from shewing any enmity to the Princess of Wales, or of countenancing the charges that were alleged against her royal highness, the Queen most studiously avoided all conversation on the subject even with the King, who acted throughout the whole affair according to the spontaneous dictates of his own mind. Nay, up to the time when the information was made to the Prince, his royal mother and sisters were in the constant habit of visiting the princess at Blackheath, nor did they cease doing so till the King himself laid a positive injunction upon them to suspend the intercourse.

The result of this investigation, however satisfactory it might be in regard to the political object for which it was instituted, could not be altogether gratifying to a mind animated by that delicate sense of female honour which trembles at the slightest whisper of reproach. What the feelings of Her Majesty were on becoming acquainted with the disclosures elicited in this inquiry will easily be conceived by those who reflect upon the peculiar situation in which she stood, and the dignity which she had to support.

In consenting to the re-admission of the princess, after what had been developed, the Queen certainly consulted prudence rather than inclination; but her affection for the King overbalanced all other considerations; and to keep his mind tranquillized, both Her Majesty and the Prince were disposed to make very large sacrifices. The death of the Duke of Brunswick, at the fatal battle of Auerstadt, and the ruined state of his family, contributed also to this exalted resolution.

The trouble of the Queen was increased at this time by the disastrous state of her native country, which, from its connexion with Prussia, had become a prey to an insolent victor, who seized upon Strelitz, and committed dreadful ravages throughout the whole Duchy of Mecklenburg.

Amidst these cares and pains of royalty, the formal grandeur of the court was to be kept up, and the smiling appearance of gaiety put on, while perhaps the heart sickened under its assumed hilarity, and grieved in secret without being able to complain.

As the eighteenth of January, 1807, fell on a Sunday, the celebration of Her Majesty's birth-day was observed on Monday. In the course of the morning, the royal dukes and other branches of the family attended to pay their respects at Buckingham House after which the Queen and princesses went to St. James's, where forty boys, educated in Christ's Hospital, attended, with their master, to exhibit the books and drawings executed by them during the preceding year, all of which were carefully examined by Her Majesty, who bestowed upon the youths many commendations.

The drawing-room was completely filled soon after the entrance of the royal party; but though the circle was extremely crowded, the Queen went through the fatigues of the day with a cheerfulness in her manner that gave universal satisfaction, while they who had the particular pleasure of her conversation were delighted with her affability.

Though it was generally expected that the Princess of Wales would have made her appearance on this occasion, the public were disappointed; and the restoration of her royal highness to the honours of the court did not take place till the middle of May, when she was presented to the Queen by the Duke of Cumberland, after which ceremony, and conversing for a few minutes with Her Majesty, she passed on to the princesses, and lastly received the congratulations of the nobility, who were very numerous.

This was a prelude to the splendid gala on the King's birth-day, when the entrance of His Ma-jeſty into the ſeventieth year of his age gave occaſion to all ranks to vie in demonſtrations of loyal affection to their venerable monarch.

The multitudes of perſons who gained admittance into the palace exceeded what had been witneſſed for many years. Every room was full, and the avenues were crowded almoſt to ſuffocation. The company continued to enter the court-yard from twelve till paſt four, and the line of carriages extended ſo far, that many perſons of the firſt faſhion got out, and walked to St. James's; though even then it was with much difficulty they could make their way through the immense throng. The inconvenience was ſcarcely leſs within the palace, where a free paſſage could hardly be made for the royal perſonages, ſuch was the eagereſs of the people to witneſs the meeting of the Prince and Princeſs of Wales in the preſence of their auguſt parents. Unfortunately, however, the King was prevented from making his appearance, in conſequence of the weakneſs of his eyes, though in other reſpects his health was unimpaired. Soon after the entrance of the Queen into the drawing-room, the Prince came, and converſed with her for ſome minutes; and about three o'clock the attention of the company was fixed upon the princeſs, who was elegantly attired, in a ſtyle that reminded every perſon preſent of Mary Queen of Scots. After complimenting Her Majeſty and the princeſſes, ſhe entered into conversation with the Prince, during which there was a profound silence throughout the assembly, as though all present had felt the same sentiment, and thought that the perfect restoration of harmony and future felicity depended upon this interesting moment. But there was nothing in the scene beyond the forms of politeness; and whatever might be the public wish, there were not wanting persons, who, from their opportunities of observation, concluded that any further connexion was impracticable.

The arrival of the Duchess of Brunswick in the following month had a considerable effect upon the national sympathy; and the interview between the King and his sister, after a separation of forty years, was the more affecting, from the circumstances of these venerable personages, the one being almost in a state of darkness, and the other a widowed exile.

On the part of Her Majesty, and indeed of the whole royal family, the most studied attentions were paid to the comforts of the aged princess, who, as long as she resided with her daughter at Blackheath; and ever after, experienced nothing but respect and kindness from her illustrious relatives.

During this session of parliament, an act was passed, pursuant to a message from the crown, for the settlement of Frogmore, with other lands in Berkshire and Buckinghamshire, appertaining to Windsor Forest, upon the Queen, for the period of ninety-nine years, or the lives of Her Majesty and the five youngest princesses.

This estate was sold, with other lands of the crown, in the time of the civil war, but reverted after the restoration, and ultimately became the leasehold property of Mrs. Egerton, from whom the Queen purchased it, and made great improvements, both in the house and grounds.

Frogmore stands about half a mile east of New Windsor, in a pleasant vale that separates the Little Park from the Forest. It is surrounded by a number of very fine old oaks and elms, many of which are in the garden, a delightful spot of thirteen acres, admirably laid out, and enriched with a vast variety of plants, shrubs, and flowers, both indigenous and exotic. Many fanciful buildings are also interspersed between the trees and along the walks; but though art has done much, the whole is made to assimilate most judiciously with the adjacent forest scenery. The house is not large, but plain, neat, and fitted up throughout in a style of elegant simplicity. Most of the apartments, however, contain very valuable cabinet paintings; which, together with Mr. West's original sketches, and, above all, the library, exhibit a striking memorial of the refined taste and solid judgment of Her Majesty. Among the literary treasures here collected, are several important works, illustrated at a great expense; and adjoining to the library, which looks into the garden, is a room containing a printing-press, and every necessary apparatus, from whence have issued some small pieces, under the immediate direction of Her Majesty, who, on being informed that the place must be entered according to act of parliament, facetiously replied to the librarian, "Well, let it be so: I believe there is no danger of our being sent to Reading gaol for printing 'libels.'"

Besides many single sheets on religious subjects, there have been printed at this royal press sets of cards, exhibiting chronological abridgments of the history of Rome, Germany, France, Spain, and Portugal, all of them extremely well calculated to assist the memory and exercise the faculties of young persons.

Two books only, of sixty copies each, have been here printed, and both in the year 1812: the first, a small octavo of one hundred and eleven pages, bearing this title, "Translations from the German, in Prose and Verse," is thus inscribed: "The Gift of the Queen to her beloved Daughters, Charlotte-Augusta-Matilda, Augusta-Sophia, Elizabeth, Mary, and Sophia: and with her permission dedicated to their Royal Highnesses, by Ellis-Constantia Knight." The other is a foolscap quarto, of ninety pages, with the simple title of “Miscellaneous Poems.” Both have an etching, by way of vignette, representing a garden view of the library. All the translations in the first book are religious, consisting of prayers, meditations, and hymns; the prose part being chiefly taken from the works of Dr. Seiler, whose explanatory works on the Scriptures may be considered as models of rational and enlightened piety, which are equally calculated to improve the understanding and touch the heart.

The volume of “Miscellaneous Poems” consists chiefly of fugitive pieces, which appear to have struck the fancy of the selector, who has also interspersed some original versions from Italian and German writers. The following “devotional piece, to be sung to Pleyel’s German hymn,” will speak for itself:

Oh! my God, thy servant hear;
To my prayer incline thine ear:
When ruddy morning streaks the skies,
To thee I lift mine op’ning eyes.

When the sun conceals his head
Beneath the western ocean’s bed,
Of thee, my God, I ask repose,
To calm with sleep my pains and woes.

When I press the bed of death,
Take, oh take, my parting breath!
Save me by thy gracious power
From all the horrors of that hour.

When the righteous judge, thy Son,
Shall sit upon his glory's throne,
And all the angelic host shall see
The dead arise from earth and sea,

Oh! then may I and mine rejoice
To hear the trumpet's awful voice,
And cloth'd in white robes, ever sing
Hosannas to our heavenly king!

CHAPTER XXIV.

Private Life of the Royal Family.—Charitable Institutions patronized by Her Majesty.—Present to the Princess Charlotte.—Care of the Education of Her Royal Highness.—Work written for that Purpose by Mrs. More.—Present of eastern Animals to the Queen.—Jubilee on the Commencement of the Fiftieth Year of His Majesty's Reign.—Grand Entertainment at Frogmore.—Reflections.—Death of the Princess Amelia.—Illness of the King.—Tribute to the Memory of Miss Gaskoin.

THOUGH their majesties began now to feel the infirmities of age, the King in a decay of vision, and the Queen in the weakness of her feet, they both enjoyed in other respects good health, and that flow of spirits which accompanies the calm remembrance of a life well spent. Their principal residence was at Windsor, where, in the bosom of domestic comforts, they passed the time with the strictest regard to an economical distribution; both rising very early, the King constantly at six, and the Queen never exceeding seven, even in the depth of winter. About nine they met the princesses at the breakfast table; soon after which they respectively separated, either for excursions or occupations. The King took his plain dinner of beef or mutton alone, without any wine, about one o'clock, and a little after four he joined the Queen and princesses at the dessert table. The remainder of the evening was spent in music, conversation, or cards, and invariably at ten their majesties retired for the night. Such was the general order observed throughout the year; but though their majesties withdrew themselves in a great degree from the pomp and parade of royalty, they did not lead a secluded life, or appear as if senility had rendered them discontented with the world. On the contrary, they were still active, and even sportively cheerful in conversation; never more happy than in contributing to the pleasure of others, and gladly embracing every opportunity of doing good without ostentation.

To the Queen, nothing was more delightful than institutions calculated for the improvement of the rising generation, and these she liberally encouraged, both by her own subscriptions, and by recommending them warmly to the support of others. About this time she patronized a school set up by the Honorable Mrs Harcourt, at Clewer, and in the same spirit of charity, she co-operated with the Princess Elizabeth in an institution at Windsor, for portioning out young women of good character in marriage. The feelings of Her Majesty were therefore highly gratified this summer, in two visits to Oatlands, where a large assemblage of orphan children dined under marquees on the green, all of them clothed, maintained, and educated, at the entire expense of the Duchess of York, who gave these entertainments on her own birth-day and that of the duke.

The harmony of the royal family was at this time undisturbed; and the intercourse between the several branches of it was both frequent and friendly. One interesting object that appeared to concentrate these sentiments of amity more closely was the Princess Charlotte of Wales, now advancing upon the stage of public life, and exciting general attention. In the spring of this year, her royal highness caught the measles, during which illness she was visited by the Queen, who presented her with a superb service of china, manufactured on purpose, from drawings executed by Lady de Clifford, the governess of the princess.

The education of her grand-daughter engaged much of Her Majesty's thoughts, and she made constant inquiries on the subject, but without appearing to exercise the least authority in the choice of instructors, or giving any directions relative to the mode of teaching which she wished to be pursued. At her suggestion, indeed, delicately and handsomely conveyed through the medium of the Bishop of London, the first female writer in the kingdom undertook a work upon royal education; the execution of which will ever redound to the honour of, the talents so employed, and the mind that elicited them on this occasion.

In the summer of 1809, Her Majesty was much gratified by the arrival of three beautiful antelopes, a male and two females, which were sent from Delhi, to the Prince of Wales, who had been long desirous of obtaining some of these fine and rare animals, to enrich the ornamental stock at Frogmore.

On the twenty-fifth of October, that favourite mansion of the Queen was the scene of splendid festivity, to commemorate the entrance of His Majesty into the fiftieth year of his reign. This national jubilee was celebrated all over the kingdom with the fullest demonstrations of loyal affection; the people every where vying with each other in their expressions of joy, on an occurrence to which no parallel could be found in the English history.

At Windsor the morning was ushered in by the sound of the trumpet; after which the drums beat to arms, and the bells began to ring a merry peal. Between eight and nine o'clock, their majesties, the Princess Elizabeth, and the Dukes of York and Sussex, attended divine service in the private chapel; on the conclusion of which, Turnerelli, the sculptor, was introduced to the Queen and the royal party, to whom he presented the bust of the King, for which His Majesty had lately sat to that artist.

But the refined entertainment was at night, when the gates of Frogmore Gardens were thrown open for the admission of company, who on their entrance were struck with astonishment and delight at the fanciful scene of variegated lamps, which, in the shape of watchmen's lanterns, were suspended through all the avenues and walks; while the lawns adjoining to the house afforded a rich display of the choicest shrubs and plants taken from the greenhouse. On the arrival of the Queen at ten o'clock the fireworks began; after which there suddenly appeared, with a magical effect, on a beautiful piece of water, two triumphal cars, each drawn by as many sea-horses. In one of these cars sat the representative of Neptune; and that which preceded it was occupied by a band of music. On coming to the temporary bridge erected over the canal opposite to the garden front, the battlements exhibited a sudden display of transparencies, with the words, "Rule Britannia," which tune was immediately played by the band. On the mount, opposite to this bridge, an elegant Grecian temple was erected, surrounded by eight beautiful marble pillars. The interior of this building was lined with purple, and in the centre was a large transparency of the eye of Providence, beaming with radiancy upon the portrait of His Majesty, and surmounted by stars of lamps. From the temple a double staircase descended to the edge of the water; and on the windings of this staircase were placed nine altars burning with incense.

On the lawn were twelve marquees, where the company partook of tea and coffee during the fireworks; covers also were laid in the principal dining rooms of the house, and at twelve the visitors sat down to an elegant supper, consisting of all the delicacies of the season. The frames were beautifully done in emblematic figures, the chief of which represented Britannia kneeling by the lion, with the eye of Providence above, and, underneath, this inscription, written by Princess Elizabeth:

“Britannia, grateful to Providence, celebrates the fiftieth year of a reign sacred to piety and virtue.”

On the island in the middle of the sheet of water a temple was erected, being a square building ornamented with Doric columns, surmounted by a dome, bearing emblematical figures, descriptive of the happy event now celebrated. Fronting the vista, or grand promenade walk, leading from the house to the lake, was a bridge, consisting of only one arch, like the Rialto at Venice, decorated and illuminated. In the centre of the temple was an altar, classically ornamented in the allegorical style, the designs of which were furnished by the Princess Elizabeth. Fronting the altar was a female figure of Gratitude, kneeling, and exactly resembling the Venus of Clomènes. The temple and bridge were the only erections made at Frogmore expressly for the jubilee festival; and the contrivance was such, that the figures in the former could be seen in perspective, by means of open arches, from the house and gardens on every side. The fanciful and romantic bower, or rustic ball-room, built under the superintendence of the Princess Elizabeth some years before, but which for some time had been suffered to fall into decay, was now repaired, ornamented with laurel leaves, and splendidly illuminated. On the lawn, and throughout the gardens, tents were erected sufficiently capacious to accommodate from twelve to fifteen hundred persons.

In the town of Windsor there were two grand triumphal arches, the first, which extended from the Castle Inn over the high street, to the town-hall, was decorated with obelisks and devices in transparent colours; and the second, in Sheet Lane, which was put up at the sole expense of Mr. Tibbett, carpenter to the Board of Works at Windsor, had no less than two thousand variegated lamps.

The minuteness of these details will be excused by him who reflects that such incidents are illustrative of personal character, as well as of the age in which they happened. The Queen has often been stigmatized with the charge of excessive parsimoniousness, than which nothing could be wider from the truth, and these festivities alone, to say nothing of her acts of benevolence, are an ample refutation of the calumny. And yet it is curious that some of those very persons who industriously circulated the falsehood, respecting the disposition of Her Majesty, should have reproached her for what they, inconsistently enough termed imprudent extravagance. It should be considered, however, that this was an event of no ordinary occurrence; and that when the Queen compared the joy that now abounded with what she had witnessed near fifty years before, on her arrival in England, it was hardly possible for her to avoid sharing in the general gladness.

But this great national feast of thanksgiving was not attended with mere pageantry and entertainments. It was distinguished also by the substantial sacrifices of mercy and charity. Large subscriptions were entered into for the relief of the distressed; and His Majesty, besides sending two thousand pounds to the society for the discharge of small debts in London, transmitted one thousand to Scotland, and a like sum to Ireland, for the same purpose. In the same spirit of kindness, he caused all the prisoners of war then on their parole, with the exception of the French, to be liberated: and the only reason why the people of the latter nation were excluded, was the barbarity shewn to the English wherever Buonaparte could extend his arbitrary mandate.

On the seventeenth of January, 1810, Her Majesty held a private court at Buckingham House, where the Persian ambassador was introduced with his credentials and presents, which last consisted of boxes of jewels, rich shawls of great value, and a most curious carpet.

The day following was observed in the usual manner at St. James's, the drawing-room being attended by all the people of fashion in town, and numerous presentations took place; throughout the whole of which fatiguing ceremony the Queen, though now nearly sixty-six years of age; conducted herself with perfect ease and condescension.

Yet; in the midst of gaiety, the heart is often heavy, and even the effervescence of joy touches upon the extreme of sorrow. Thus, at the present time, while the appearance of felicity was kept up by the British court, and while the feelings of a loyal people overflowed in the demonstration of attachment to the best of sovereigns, the cloud of trouble was about to damp the enjoyments of the palace, and to spread consternation over the country. The Princess Amelia, their majesties' youngest daughter, had long been in a declining state of health; for which, among other means employed, the sea-air and bathing had hitherto proved most beneficial, but without affording any flattering prospect of recovery. At the beginning of this year, the disorder of her royal highness assumed a more alarming aspect; and as the summer advanced, symptoms arose which set all medical skill at defiance. From her earliest youth she was of a very delicate constitution, and was frequently attacked with serious complaints, which increased as she grew up; and, though partially relieved, they never failed to recur at certain periods, and generally under new forms, with aggravated severity. At the beginning of autumn, the princess was attacked with St. Anthony's fire to a violent degree, which brought on such excruciating pains as could not but shatter a frame naturally tender, and already weakened by the repeated assaults of an incurable malady. During the whole of her sufferings, which language cannot describe, she displayed the noblest Christian fortitude; and this spirit of pious resignation to the will of Providence increased in proportion to her agonies, so that she truly overcame the sting of death by the power of faith. While thus she lay languishing in expectation of her last hour, the King attended her constantly, administering to his child every consolation that could be drawn from religion, though his own heart suffered dreadfully in witnessing the pains which he could not alleviate. Nor did the Queen feel less acutely for her daughter and husband, between both of whom, at this awful season, her cares were divided. The whole family, indeed, were depressed with sorrow; and at the same time that every one knew there was no hope of recovery, all seemed to dread the arrival of the moment of separation, which, to the royal patient herself, was that of desirable deliverance. For the last few days, the strength of the princess rapidly wore away, and she died about twelve o'clock on the second of November, without the least convulsive motion, as one dropping insensibly and calmly into a gentle sleep. A short time before her death, wishing to present her venerable father with a token of filial duty and affection, she caused a ring to be made, containing a small lock of her hair, inclosed under a crystal tablet, set round with a few sparks of diamonds. When this affecting memorial was completed, she kept it in her hand till the King came to pay his usual visit, when she placed it herself upon his finger, and then said, as her fine though pallid features were turned fondly towards the afflicted countenance of her august parent, "Take this token, to remember me."

The effect of this present on the paternal heart of His Majesty, after so many severe trials during his daughter's illness, was like that of an electric shock. He withdrew from the apartment, overpowered with grief, and never entered it again. The princess having thus gratified her anxious desire, resigned herself to the stroke of fate, and in a few days expired, without knowing that her father was ill, and that by her innocent endearment she had been the cause of his malady.

In person, her royal highness was tall and slender, with an air remarkably graceful and prepossessing, although a long course of indisposition had impressed striking marks on her charming and expressive countenance. This frequency of ill-health prevented her from studying so deeply as her elder sisters; and yet she had cultivated the fine arts with great success. In music and painting she was a proficient; and few could equal her on the piano-forte. Notwithstanding a long and agonizing sickness, which, like the canker-worm, preyed inwardly upon her constitution, she was generally cheerful, and ever studied to conceal her sufferings as much as possible, to avoid giving pain to her friends and attendants. In performing the duties of humanity she was indefatigable; and in the relations of domestic life nothing could exceed her attention, assiduity, and affection.

The remains of her royal highness were on the night of the fourteenth privately interred in St. George's Chapel; and during the whole day on which the funeral took place the shops in Windsor and Eton were shut up: as a farther testimony of respect to the memory of the princess, scarcely an individual was to be seen in the streets who was not attired in mourning.

The princess, by her will, directed that all her jewels should be sold for the payment of what she owed, and the discharge of a few bequests; but the Prince of Wales, who was left residuary legatee, gave the whole of the property to the Princess Mary, who had incessantly watched the dying bed of her sister, taking upon herself the responsibility of settling all the claims. One extraordinary and affecting testimony to the exalted virtues of the deceased appeared in the effect produced by her demise upon Miss Gaskoin, a favourite attendant, who sorrowed for her loss to such a degree, that, in a short time, she followed her royal mistress to the grave. Out of respect to this excellent young lady, His Majesty ordered that her remains should be deposited as near as possible to the royal vault, and a marble tablet to be placed on the right hand aisle of St. George's Chapel, with the following inscription :

King George III.

caused to be interred near this Place

the Body of MARY GASKOIN,

Servant to the late Princess Amelia :

and this Stone

to be inscribed in Testimony of his grateful Sense

Of the faithful Service and Attachment

Of an amiable young Woman to his beloved Daughter,

Whom she survived only three months.

She died the 19th of February, 1811.

CHAPTER XXV.

Illness of the King.—Parliamentary Proceedings.—Address to Her Majesty.—Hopes of Recovery.—Interview with the Queen.—Fête at Carlton House.—Relapse.—Birth-Day of the Princess Charlotte.—Parliamentary Grant.—Drawing-Room.—Assassination of Mr. Percival.—State of Public Affairs.—Birth-Day of the Prince Regent.—Death of the Duchess of Brunswick.—A Maniac.—Consecration of the Bishop of London.

AT the beginning of October, His Majesty betrayed symptoms of nervous debility, which proceeded from intense anxiety about the state of his beloved child; but though the disorder appeared at first in a gentle form, it continued to increase till the end of the month, when he became incapable of transacting business. In the first week of November, the mental irritability was so very great, that the King had scarcely any clear idea of persons or circumstances for two minutes together; in consequence of which, parliament met without any farther prorogation, but adjourned again for a fortnight; at the expiration of which time, a farther adjournment took place till the twentieth of December, when a warm debate ensued on the propositions brought forward by the minister relative to the state of the nation. The precedent in 1788 formed the basis of the present proceedings, and while it was proposed to commit the powers of government, with limitations, into the hands of the Prince of Wales, the care and guardianship of the King's person, together with the entire appointment and direction of the household, were to be entrusted to the Queen, and the council appointed to assist Her Majesty in the discharge of the weighty trust. It was not to be expected that such a measure would pass without opposition, and accordingly a fierce one was made through all the stages of the propositions, which, however, were carried, with modifications, through both houses, who concurred in an address to the Queen, expressing a hope that she would be graciously pleased to undertake the important duties proposed to be invested in Her Majesty as soon as an act of parliament should have been passed for carrying the resolution into effect. To this address Her Majesty made this reply :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ That sense of duty and gratitude to the King, and of obligation to this country, which induced me in the year 1789 readily to promise my most earnest attention to the anxious and momentous trust at that time intended to be reposed in me by parliament, is strengthened, if possible, by the uninterrupted enjoyment of those blessings which I have continued to experience under the protection of His Majesty since that period : and I should be wanting to all my duties if I hesitated to accept the sacred trust which is now offered to me. The assistance, in point of counsel and advice, which the wisdom of parliament proposes to provide for me, will make me undertake the charge with greater hopes, that I may be able satisfactorily to fulfil the important duties which it must impose upon me. Of the nature and importance of that charge, I cannot but be duly sensible, involving, as it does, every thing which is valuable to myself, as well as the highest interests of a people endeared to me by so many ties and considerations ; but by nothing so strongly as by their steady, loyal, and affectionate attachment to the best of kings."

During the progress of the bill, His Majesty became more tranquil, collected, and even inquisitive into the state of public affairs, so as to hold out the hopes of a speedy recovery. Still, however, it was expedient that the regency should be settled for the discharge of the proper functions of government, and the Prince entered upon his high office under the restrictions which the wisdom of parliament had thought it prudent to impose. By the middle of May, the King was so far restored to the possession of his faculties, that, on the nineteenth, he went to Her Majesty's apartments in Windsor Castle for the first time after his confinement, to congratulate her upon the return of her birth-day. The scene was uncommonly interesting, and the whole of the royal family were present, to share in the pleasure which it afforded. On the following day, the inhabitants of Windsor were gratified by the first appearance of their venerable sovereign on horseback after his illness. His Majesty rode between two equerries, one of whom guided his horse, with a cane which had a crook at one end of it, for the purpose of catching the bridle. The King was accompanied in this excursion by the Princesses Augusta and Sophia, with whom he chatted in his usual cheerful way.

On the thirteenth of the following month, the Prince Regent gave a most splendid fête at Carlton House, with a two-fold motive: first, in honour of the birth-day of his august parent; and, secondly, to benefit the numerous classes of British artizans and tradesmen, who, by the illness of the sovereign, and the discontinuance of the accustomed splendour of the court, had been deprived of many advantages. His royal highness, therefore, determined to exhibit a magnificent entertainment, not out of ostentation, but with a view to general utility; on which account he expressed his wish that all the invited guests would attend in habits of native manufacture. But this gleam of joy, occasioned by the amended state of His Majesty's health, was suddenly extinguished, and before the expiration of a month, the disorder returned with sudden and frightful violence. The immediate cause of this repercussion was never made known to the public; but there can be little doubt of the fact, that the being deprived of power, and an apprehension of political changes, contrary to His Majesty's sentiments, operated so strongly on his mind as to produce an incurable exacerbation.

Nothing, of course, was left undone that could possibly be thought of to tranquillize the royal patient, to dissipate his fears, and win his confidence; but all these attempts only served to heighten the disease, and towards the end of the year an official report was made, in which it was stated, that though some of the physicians did not absolutely pronounce a recovery impossible, yet, that under all the circumstances of the case, it was their unanimous opinion that such an event was scarcely probable. In this gloomy state of things, parliament assembled on the seventh of January, 1812; and as on that day the Princess Charlotte entered the seventeenth year of her age, the same was observed with due distinction at Carlton House, where Her Majesty, the princesses, and a select party, were sumptuously entertained. A few days afterwards the chancellor of the exchequer proposed and carried a motion for granting a permanent addition of ten thousand a-year to Her Majesty's income, which, however, was vigorously resisted by the leaders of the opposition, as a measure rather calculated to increase the ministerial influence, than for the benefit of the royal family.

After a lapse of two years, the splendour of the court was revived in a drawing-room, held by Her Majesty at St. James's on the last day of April, which was numerously attended; and in the evening, the Prince Regent gave a grand entertainment to the Queen, princesses, and a very large party of the nobility.

The melancholy fate of that upright statesman, Mr. Perceval, who fell by the hands of an assassin, in the sanctuary of the constitution, made a deep impression upon the Queen, who, as well as the King, had ever entertained a great respect for his eminent talents and unostentatious virtues. The steady conduct of this excellent man in the settlement of the regency contributed to raise him still higher in the estimation of Her Majesty, and of almost every branch of the royal family. Such indeed was the sterling worth, and engaging manners, of Mr. Perceval, that no one could become slightly acquainted with him, and forbear the wish to cultivate a closer intimacy.

Both the Queen and the Regent, therefore, felt this loss very acutely, as one not easily repaired, and which at that critical juncture of affairs was likely to prove extremely injurious to the public interests. Great changes in the political world were naturally expected to be the consequence of this calamitous event, and for some weeks the executive government stood suspended, waiting the appointment of new ministers in the room of those who then acted, but who in fact had already resigned their places. At length, however, after every honourable effort had been made in vain to unite the different leaders of the opposition, the Prince very judiciously renewed the power of the administration, which had received what was considered a death-blow; and the nation had soon reason to applaud the resolution.

In the mean time, the disorder of the King took a very unfavourable turn, and the paroxysms which he suffered exceeded what had occurred since his illness. Some of these attacks lasted without intermission fifty or sixty hours, and at one time the royal patient was left in a speechless state, so as to create the most fearful apprehensions in the minds of his medical attendants.

Nothing but the strength of a constitution invigorated by temperance could have borne up against this fearful conflict in the system, the agitation of which, both in violence and duration, astonished those who were called to the painful task of witnessing the scene. Sometime previous to this, the Queen, accompanied by one or two of the princesses, used to visit His Majesty for an hour or more every day ; and though his discourse was rapid, with frequent wanderings, yet upon the whole he was calm, and never failed to recognize the presence of his family. But now this solace could be no longer enjoyed : his mental aberrations were continual, and a dark cloud seemed to have blotted out the remembrance of all existing objects for ever. Still, amidst this chaos, some of the most intelligent of the faculty were not altogether without hopes of a partial recovery, in which idea they were encouraged by what had occurred after former paroxysms. This judgment received some confirmation ; and though the royal sufferer did not regain the powers of intellectual discernment, his bodily health was speedily recruited, and in a short time he was pronounced to be, in that respect, as well as he was before the recent attack.

While the British nation was thus inwardly distressed, she had the consolation to see her exertions successful in the deliverance of others ; and though a dismal and cheerless gloom had entered into her own palaces, the light of joy was beaming, by her means, over distant lands. The struggle for independence in the Peninsula, aided by the powerful operations of the British army under the illustrious Wellington, now excited the attention and eager expectation of all Europe. A mighty crisis was evidently approaching, and even those, who had long abandoned all hope of seeing a termination put to the ambitious career of the usurper of the French throne, began to think that his idol, Fortune, was about to exhibit another instance of her inconstancy. But they, who, mindful of deeper causes, calmly reflected that in the excess of power gained by crime, the elements of self-destruction are necessarily accumulated with the means of oppression, looked upon the passing scene as preluding an important change for the repose of the world. 11

It was impossible that persons who viewed things in this light could avoid turning their thoughts with sympathetic concern towards the exiled family of France, then enjoying on British ground that security and hospitality which had been cruelly denied them every where else.

Persecuted by the usurper of their inheritance, and abandoned in their utmost need by the monarchs of their own blood, they found a tranquil asylum in this island, even when peace with the oppressor might have been obtained by their expulsion. 11

Whatever reason, therefore, England has to be proud of her achievements by land and sea, this triumph of honour and humanity far exceeded in solid glory all the splendour of her victories. 11

As such it was duly appreciated by both the royal families; and exquisite must have been their mutual feelings when they met together at Oatlands on the thirtieth of July, when the Duke and Duchess of York gave a splendid entertainment, at which were present, with the Queen and most of the royal family, all the members of the House of Bourbon then in England.

The birth-day of the Prince Regent was this year publicly celebrated for the first time, on which occasion Her Majesty entertained his royal highness and a numerous party at Frogmore.

On the twenty-fourth of March, 1813, the Duchess-Dowager of Brunswick died, in the seventy-sixth year of her age, having been ill only two days, and in the following week her remains were interred in the new cemetery at Windsor.

A short time after this event, an incident occurred which greatly affected the Queen, and had like to have proved of very serious consequence.

Miss Davenport, who was born in the household, where her mother had for near forty years enjoyed a respectable situation, fell into a desponding way on the death of the Princess Amelia; but as she exhibited no symptoms of violent derangement, little notice was taken of her eccentricities. She slept in the tower over the Queen's bed-room; and about five o'clock in the morning of the second of May Her Majesty was awakened by a loud knocking at the outward door of her chamber, accompanied with frightful screams. Mrs. Beckendorf, the Queen's dresser, who slept in the same room with Her Majesty, instantly arose, and both for some time hesitated about what was to be done. On ascertaining a female voice, Mrs. Beckendorf slowly opened the inner door, and ventured out into the apartment from whence the noise proceeded, where she was encountered by Miss Davenport with extreme ferocity, demanding access to the Queen. She had a letter in her hand, which she insisted upon delivering to Her Majesty, who heard all that passed, and was in great distress for Mrs. Beckendorf, without being able to render her the least assistance. After a long struggle, that lady succeeded in keeping off the unhappy maniac till Mr. Grobecker, the Queen's page, arrived with two footmen; but even these three could not manage the poor creature without calling Mr. Meyer, the porter, who being a very powerful man, carried her up stairs to her own room. Dr. Willis was then sent for, by whose directions a straight waistcoat was put on, and Miss Davenport instantly conveyed in a post-chaise to an asylum for lunatics at Hoxton.

On Sunday, the third of October, this year, Her Majesty and two of the princesses went to see the solemnity of an episcopal consecration, performed in the chapel of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. Howley, the Bishop of London, was the prelate who received this distinction ; and he is the only divine in the present reign who has been so honoured. After the ceremony, which made a deep impression upon the Queen and her daughters, they partook of an elegant collation, and at three o'clock returned to Buckingham House.

nied with frightful screams. Mrs. Beckendorf, the Queen's dresser, who slept in the same room with Her Majesty, instantly arose, and both for some time hesitated about what was to be done. On ascertaining a female voice, Mrs. Beckendorf slowly opened the inner door, and ventured out into the apartment from whence the noise proceeded, where she was encountered by Miss Davenport with extreme ferocity, demanding access to the Queen. She had a letter in her hand, which she insisted upon delivering to Her Majesty, who heard all that passed, and was in great distress for Mrs. Beckendorf, without being able to render her the least assistance. After a long struggle, that lady succeeded in keeping off the unhappy maniac till Mr. Grobecker, the Queen's page, arrived with two footmen; but even these three could not manage the poor creature without calling Mr. Meyer, the porter, who being a very powerful man, carried her up stairs to her own room. Dr. Willis was then sent for, by whose directions a straight waistcoat was put on, and Miss Davenport instantly conveyed in a post-chaise to an asylum for lunatics at Hoxton.

On Sunday, the third of October, this year, Her Majesty and two of the princesses went to see the solemnity of an episcopal consecration, performed in the chapel of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. Howley, the Bishop of London, was the prelate who received this distinction ; and he is the only divine in the present reign who has been so honoured. After the ceremony, which made a deep impression upon the Queen and her daughters, they partook of an elegant collation, and at three o'clock returned to Buckingham House.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Brilliant Aspect of Public Affairs.—Arrival of the Duchess of Oldenburg.—Departure of the Royal Family of France.—Correspondence of the Princess of Wales.—Arrival of the Allied Sovereigns.—Anecdote of the King.—Temporary Elopement of the Princess Charlotte.—The Princess of Wales leaves the Kingdom.—Reflections.—National Jubilee.—Grand Fête at Frogmore.—Drawing-Room.—Princess Charlotte's Entertainment.

A CENTURY had now elapsed since the accession of the house of Brunswick to the throne of these realms; and the year which completed the cycle was distinguished by events that contributed to heighten the national joy in the commemoration of the interesting period.

The arrival of the Duchess of Oldenburg in London, at the end of March, seemed like the harbinger of a delightful spring, after a long and cheerless winter. This amiable and accomplished princess received from all ranks of persons the most cordial welcome; and the Queen, with the whole of her family, strove by every exertion to render the stay of the illustrious stranger in England as agreeable as possible.

The departure of the King of France to take possession of the throne of his ancestors, accompanied by the remaining branches of the Bourbons, who had survived the revolutionary tempest, gave a touching effect to this picture of providence; for such it was in all its parts, as well as in the general issue. In contemplating the mighty change that had taken place, and looking with astonishment upon the sudden downfall of the colossal power that had so recently defied and appalled the world, even sceptical minds could scarcely avoid adopting the language of the philosophical orator: "Non est humano consilio, ne mediocri quidem, Deorum immortalium cura, res illa perfecta, religiones mercurale ipse, quæ illam belluam cadere viderunt commovisse se videntur, et jus in illo suum retinuisse." No human wisdom, indeed, could have foreseen or contrived such an event, which was altogether so far out of the ordinary course of things, as almost to give to the scene an appearance of the divine agency.

While Her Majesty shared in the general feeling, and was deeply grateful for the blessings which produced it, her spirits were damped, and her mind agitated, by a very unpleasant dilemma. It having been announced that the Emperor Alexander and the King of Prussia would visit England in the course of the summer, due notice was given of the Queen's intention to hold two drawing-rooms at Buckingham House, which of course excited a considerable bustle in the fashionable world. In the mean time, the Prince Regent transmitted a communication to his august parent, in which His Royal Highness observed, "that for reasons of which he alone was the judge, he had formed a fixed and unalterable determination never to meet the Princess of Wales upon any occasion, either in public or private."

Thus situated, the Queen had no alternative; for, as the presence of the Regent at court was indispensable, and he had himself clogged it with a condition, nothing was left to Her Majesty but to apprise the princess that she could not be received at the drawing-room. This communication was followed by a correspondence, in which the princess introduced much irrelevant matter, not unmixed with bitter reproach and indignant menace. In her letter to the Queen, the princess, after beseeching Her Majesty to acquaint the illustrious strangers with the reason of her absence, very strangely signified her intention of making the cause public to all the world. In answer to this long note, the Queen took notice of this curious request and declaration, in the following terms: "Her Majesty could have felt no hesitation in communicating to the illustrious strangers who may possibly be present at her court, the circumstances which will prevent the Princess of Wales from appearing there, if Her Royal Highness had not rendered a compliance with her wish to this effect unnecessary, by intimating her intention of making public the cause of her absence." This drew a reply, in which the princess endeavoured to reconcile the inconsistency of asking the Queen to do that which she was about to perform herself; but Her Majesty, in acknowledging the receipt of the note, declined any farther discussion of the subject. The princess, however, was as good as her word, and the letters not only made their appearance in the daily prints, but were transmitted by her to the speaker of the House of Commons, which produced some vehement speeches, and had the effect of procuring for her royal highness a parliamentary grant of thirty-five thousand a-year.

Amidst this ungracious business, the Queen and the Prince were exposed to much obloquy; and the insults offered to them by the misguided populace reflected disgrace upon those, who, from party motives, took a pleasure in spreading a flame which they ought to have extinguished.

During these heats, the allied sovereigns landed at Dover; and may Englishmen ever remember with honest pride the emphatic exclamation of the Emperor, "God be praised! I have set my foot upon the land which has saved us all!"

On the eighth of June, the day after their arrival in London, a court, unexampled in point of splendour, was held at the Queen's palace, expressly for their introduction; after which, Her Majesty, the princesses, and their illustrious visitors, dined with the Prince Regent at Carlton House. On the tenth, the allied sovereigns, with a numerous train, went to Ascot races, taking Richmond and Hampton Court by the way; and on the course they were joined by the Queen and her family, with whom they afterwards dined at Frogmore.

A detail of the entertainments which distinguished this season of festivity would be perhaps amusing; but it is here unnecessary, as Her Majesty had little share in them, owing to her advanced period of life and increasing infirmities. Nothing, however, was omitted that could do honour to the imperial and royal visitors, who left the kingdom, after a stay of three weeks, strongly impressed with sentiments of admiration and regard.

A circumstance happened at this period which greatly afflicted the Queen, and made her almost incapable of entering, with animated delight, into the extraordinary spectacle then exhibiting, and of which her family and court formed, as it were, the central point of observation. While the allied sovereigns were receiving and communicating pleasure, our venerable monarch began to evince an appearance of returning reason, so far indeed as to be made sensible of the great revolution that had taken place in Europe. The Queen being, of course, duly apprized of this pleasing change, ordered that she should be informed when His Majesty was in a state capable of conversation. She was so; and, on entering into the room, she found the King singing a hymn, and accompanying it on the harpsichord; after which, he knelt down and prayed most fervently for the Queen, his children, and the nation, concluding with an earnest supplication for himself, that it would please the great disposer of all events to remove the heavy calamity under which he laboured; but if not, to give him the spirit of patient resignation and humble submission to the divine will. Having concluded this solemn act of devotion, the aged monarch burst into tears: the gleam of reason fled, and Her Majesty was too much moved by what she had witnessed to disturb him more by her presence.

Another occurrence, which at this period gave no little uneasiness to the Queen, was the flight of the Princess Charlotte on the evening of the twelfth of July, from Brunswick House, to the residence of her mother, in Connaught Place, Hyde Park Corner. Notice of this strange elopement was instantly despatched to Her Majesty, who had a card party at Buckingham House, but which instantly broke up in consequence of an event so utterly unexpected and distressing to the parental feelings of the Queen.

Happily, however, the royal fugitive was soon convinced of the error which she had committed; and at three in the morning she was restored to the arms of her father at Carlton House.

While the public mind was agitated on account of this singular affair, and every imagination was exercised in wild conjectures respecting the cause of it, another occasion of surprize and rumour arose in the avowed declaration of the Princess of Wales to withdraw from the kingdom. No obstacle was thrown in the way of this design on the part of government; and every thing that her royal highness could reasonably expect was readily granted by the Regent, who was, however; most ungenerously reproached in a letter which the princess left behind her for publication, "as her most inveterate enemy, imposed upon by false accusers, and enemies to her honour."

It is painful even to recur to these circumstances; but as they must necessarily form a part of the national history, the interest of truth requires it to be told, that the princess had no enemies but those who were immediately in her confidence and about her person; that whatever trouble she suffered, was brought upon herself by connexions which she should have avoided, and an impetuous spirit that it became her to have governed, instead of letting it loose to the annoyance of the peace of her illustrious and forbearing relatives.

No people upon earth are more easily led away by their feelings than the English ; and thus it is, that ninety-nine times in a hundred they are the dupes of their credulity. The most extravagant tale of woe moves their sympathy to the profuseness of liberality, and an inflammatory speech of invective at once rouses their indignation to an excess of violence. In neither case do they stop to enquire into the reality of the stories which operate upon their passions, whence it frequently happens that their pity is as unmerited as their resentment is unjust. But popularity conferred by faction is of short duration, and censure proceeding from ignorance is unworthy of a wise man's concern.

Though the departure of the Princess of Wales was a grievous disappointment to the stirrers of mischief, and the zealots of party, it was a measure of great public benefit, by giving the people an opportunity of calming their temper and correcting their judgment.

To commemorate the splendid events of this wonderful year, it was resolved to celebrate a grand national jubilee ; and the first of August, as being the centenary of the accession of the Brunswick family, and the day also distinguished by the battle of the Nile, was most appropriately selected for that purpose. The early part of the morning appeared very inauspicious to the wishes of the anxious inhabitants of the metropolis, but towards noon the sun shone out in all his glory, and in every direction crowds were seen hastening towards the seat of attraction in the three parks.

On this occasion Her Majesty invited the Regent and two hundred and fifty persons of the first distinction to dinner at Buckingham House. After the exhibition of a naval engagement on the Serpentine, a curious entertainment was presented to the admiring spectators in a display of fire-works on the water, representing a variety of shifting figures, the Protean forms and velocity of which delighted the beholders. But the Green Park, in which was the royal booth, was the principal object of attraction, by having a castellated temple, with a Chinese bridge thrown over Constitution Hill. Here also a balloon was prepared, and completely filled by six o'clock; but the ascension was delayed a few minutes that the Queen and the princesses might witness the spectacle. As soon as it was dark, the bridge and royal booth were illuminated; soon after which a discharge of artillery announced the commencement of the fire-works, which were on the grandest scale ever witnessed. This was the triumph of the pyrotechnic art, and combined all that the imagination could possibly conceive of the sublime and beautiful, in tremendous effect, and vivid representation. From the battlements of the castle a number of rockets were sent up, and at the same moment the walls exhibited a wonderful variety of brilliant ornaments. Each rocket contained several smaller ones, which at a great height shot out innumerable glittering stars, that threw an air of enchantment over the trees and lawns beneath. These rockets then burst, when a shower of fiery light descended to the earth, and extended over a considerable space of ground. After this, the fortress changed suddenly into the Temple of Concord, moving upon an axis, and displaying a number of allegorical transparencies suited to the occasion.

St. James's Park had all the appearance of Vauxhall on a full night. Over the Canal was erected a bridge, elegantly ornamented with temples and pillars, surmounted by a lofty pagoda. Along the sides of the Canal numerous tents were pitched, and on its bosom floated several wherries. About ten o'clock, the bridge and its towering superstructure became an object of singular beauty, and the whole had the appearance of an edifice of golden fire. Every part of it was covered with lamps, the glass reflectors in proper places relieving the dazzling splendour with their silver lustre; the canopies of the temple throwing up wheels and stars, the pillars covered with radiant light, every rising tower sending forth showers of flame, while from the lofty summit of the pagoda rockets ascended in majestic flights, and with inconceivable rapidity. The effect of this combination of light on the water which flowed beneath, and on the verdant foliage of the surrounding trees, as well as on the scattered tents, and moving groups on the lawn, surpassed all power of description.

But this scene of magnificent amusement ended tragically; and about midnight the pagoda exhibited an appearance that soon converted the pleasure of the spectators into alarm. The upper towers were enveloped in a sheet of flame, which resisted all the efforts employed to extinguish it, and in a short space the splendid structure was destroyed. The catastrophe was much lamented by those who admired the elegance of the building as a work of taste; but this disaster was nothing, when compared to the loss of two lives, and the injury sustained by several other persons who were employed upon the works.

On the seventh of January, 1815, the queen gave a grand entertainment at Frogmore, in honour of the Princess Charlotte, who then completed her nineteenth year; and shortly afterwards Her Majesty's birth-day was celebrated at the same place in a similar manner with a concert, in which her royal highness performed some difficult pieces of music on the grand-piano to admiration. On the eighteenth of May a drawing-room was held at Buckingham House, which, on account of its being the first since the departure of the allied sovereigns, and, above all, as it was known that the Princess

Charlotte would be there, attracted a numerous assemblage of the nobility and gentry. At the end of the same month the princess gave her first entertainment at Carlton House, which was attended by all the female branches of the family, and a large party of friends, who were delighted with the harmony that breathed throughout the British court, and the pleasing prospect which it gave of increasing felicity, little dreaming, while they contemplated the gaiety of the scene, that she, who now irradiated the circle, and inspired all hearts with joy, would in a short space be shrouded in darkness.

Sic stella noctu, per liquidum æthera,
Sublimis, ardens, conspicitur polo
Flammas coruscans; mox, repenti
Lapsa, petit peritura terras.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Return of Buonaparte.—Battle of Waterloo.—Feelings of the Queen.—Marriage of the Duke of Cumberland.—Letter of Her Majesty to the Duke of Mecklenburg.—Justification of her subsequent Conduct towards the Duchess.—Anecdote of the Queen.

WHILE England, in common with the other powers of Europe, was celebrating the restoration of peace, and devising measures for the security of that inestimable blessing, the disturber of the world, instead of being thankful for the superabundant liberality which he had experienced, and endeavouring to atone by his conduct for the miseries he had produced, was scheming to renew the horrors of war. Alike callous to the sufferings of humanity, the compunctions of conscience, and the sense of honour, he returned with the malice of a dæmon, determined upon dominion, though aware that in gaining it he must pass through an ocean of blood. The crisis was fearful; and they whose hopes were the strongest in favour of justice could not conceal their apprehensions. The fate of successive generations appeared to be suspended on a single thread, and all who had the happiness of their fellow creatures at heart watched the issue with intense anxiety.

Her Majesty, though naturally of a cheerful temperament, and disciplined by religious principle to a spirit of resigned submission to the divine will, in all things, could not but feel a deep concern for the result of the eventful scene which was then passing before an astonished world.

Happily, however, the trial of fortitude was short; and the deliverance of mankind was effected by a single stroke, so rapid, tremendous, and decisive, as to remind the serious observer of the prophetic triumph over the tyrant of Babylon: "How art thou fallen from Heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground which didst weaken the nations! They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, 'is this the man that did make the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof?'"

This was, indeed, a season for thankfulness, and as such the Queen considered it, whose contemplative mind always gathered from the scenes which excited the wonder of the multitude matter of confidence in the dispensations of Providence. Conformably to this principle, she studiously regulated her own actions by a conscientious attention to the rule of moral obligation; without suffering the sense of duty to be compromised by motives of policy or the power of persuasion. Of this firmness an instance occurred at the present period, on the marriage of the Duke of Cumberland with his cousin the Princess of Salms Braunfels, daughter of the reigning Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz. A considerable time before this alliance was entered into, the Duke of Cambridge, with the consent of their majesties, offered his hand to the princess, who accepted the proposal; and matters went so far that the great seal was even put to the royal assent, when suddenly, to the regret of the Queen, the contract was broken off, owing, as Her Majesty then understood, to some objections raised against the marriage by the Princess of Salms, who had conceived an affection for the Duke of Cumberland. Not being made acquainted with further particulars, and far from suspecting that the King had concealed any thing out of regard to her feelings, the Queen was induced afterwards to sanction the proposed union, between her other son and the princess her niece, to whom she wrote some letters for the regulation of their conduct, and one also on the subject to her brother, the duke, of which the following is a translation:

Windsor, October the 10th, 1814.

I can scarcely find words sufficiently strong to express to you the joy I felt on receiving your letter, with which my son's messenger was charged. The excuses you make respecting your long silence, my dear friend, are superfluous, knowing, as I do, that the waters of Pyrmont will not allow of any application whatever, and as I agree with you that the Princess of Salms could not, on this occasion, foresee that you would not write. Thus, then, this union is near its conclusion. God grant that the brilliant perspective which both have formed may be realized; in the result of which, the age of both authorizes the most flattering hopes, and in which the character you trace of your daughter gives me the greatest confidence. You may be assured, my dear brother, that I shall endeavour to render the residence of the Princess of Salms amongst us as pleasant and agreeable as circumstances will permit, considering that my sedentary life prevents me from contributing to the amusement of the princess, and that the greater part of my time is passed in the country, where our society is very limited, and our life uniform. She will, however, be always a welcome guest when she comes; and we shall endeavour, my daughters and myself, to do our best to entertain her. I have written to my son, the Duke of Cumberland, my ideas relative to the children of Salms. I thought this necessary, to correct a misunderstanding which had taken place on both sides. I endeavoured, to the utmost of my power, to convince him how necessary it was to observe the precautions which I suggested. The desire of preventing inconveniencies in future to both parties induced me take this step.

As I have reason to believe that paternal advice will have a salutary influence on your daughter, I think I may confide to you what will be essential for the princess on her arrival here. The usages of this country being so different from what they are on the continent, in every respect, I fear that my son may not be sufficiently attentive to them. As this is for you alone, I confide to you, that it is not the fashion here to receive morning visits from gentlemen, to which she will be exposed, by the circumstance of the Duke being colonel of a regiment, unless he himself introduces them to her: she should also be very circumspect in the choice of ladies with whom she shall associate, which will be so much the more necessary, as the Duke has acquaintance amongst our sex, who, although not actually of bad conduct, might, however, become injurious to her in point of policy. I have found that the advice of the dear King, "of being uniformly polite to every one, of doing nothing in the spirit of party, and of adhering closely to his family," has been my surest guidance during my long residence here; and I think I cannot do better than to transmit those sentiments to you, dear brother and friend, as father to my niece and future daughter-in-law, which you will make use of in such a manner as you shall judge proper.

I have sent by the messenger six pounds of tea and two cheeses; eat the latter to my health; and in drinking the tea, remember a sister whose attachment for you will not cease but with death.

Sir, my dearest brother,

Your very affectionate sister and faithful friend,

CHARLOTTE.

When this letter was written, the Queen had no reason to believe that the proposed measure would have been at all disagreeable to the King, were he then in a capacity to act as a father and a sovereign. On the contrary, she was fully persuaded that in giving her assent to the alliance she only did that which he would have done himself, and to which he would give his entire approbation in the event of his recovery. Shortly afterwards, however, she was undeceived, and more than one of her nearest relatives communicated information, which, as it convinced her of the tender affection manifested by the dear king for her feelings, pointed out directly the course which she had to pursue in a dutiful attention to his. Her Majesty's situation was painfully distressing; but she could not endure the thought of wounding that mind which was always ready to make sacrifices for her tranquillity, and of which the present instance was a striking proof. . . .

Her feelings on this occasion were communicated without delay to the Regent, in a personal conference, in order that the Duke of Cumberland might be early apprised of the change which had taken place in Her Majesty's sentiments, and of her fixed resolution never to receive the princess at the English court. After this explicit declaration, accompanied as it was by a statement of the reasons on which the resolution was founded, the Queen did not expect that the marriage would have taken place. Notwithstanding this, the ceremony was performed with great pomp in the church of Strelitz, on the twenty-ninth of May following; and at the end of the summer, the royal couple, together with the Duke of Mecklenburg, arrived in England, where the marriage was renewed, conformably to act of parliament, at Carlton House, though neither Her Majesty nor any of the princesses honoured the nuptials with their presence. With the same firmness the Queen resisted every attempt made to shake the determination which she had formed of excluding the duchess from her court. Her reply to every remonstrance and importunity was uniform and consistent: "I cannot do that in the present state of the King, which I would not venture to do in opposition to his judgment."

This answer, so decidedly characteristic of a noble mind, alive only to the sense of duty, renders all further observation on the subject superfluous, and any notice of the calumnies that were industriously circulated on the occasion perfectly unnecessary.

At this time the Queen and her daughters resided wholly at Windsor, where they received their foreign visitors, as well as other friends, in a very hospitable though private manner. One fine day in the autumn, Her Majesty invited several of the nobility to accompany her and three of the princesses on a fishing party, to the Virginia Water, where tents were erected for their accommodation. Just after dinner the young ladies of the boarding-school at Egham House happening to pass by, the Queen affably desired them to approach and take some refreshment, kindly noticed each individually, and retained all of them some hours, during which the band played, while fifteen couple danced on the shaded lawn.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

State of the King's Health.—Anecdote.—Arrival of Prince Leopold.—Fête at Frogmore.—Marriage of the Princess Charlotte.—Queen's Drawing-Room.—Ascot Races.—Anecdote.—Marriage of the Princess Mary.—Death of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz.

THOUGH the mental disease of His Majesty was now so completely decided as to preclude all hope of recovery, it was a consolation to find that his general health was unimpaired; and that amidst the wanderings of a disordered imagination, his feelings were not worked up to a paroxysm of suffering by the constant pressure of any ideal evil. For some time, indeed, the sense of regal dignity, the natural result of long habit, made him occasionally impatient, but this gradually subsided; and although the consciousness of what he was could not be entirely obliterated, it ceased to produce any violent effects.

About the present period, the image of royalty began to fade away altogether; and as the sensory could receive nothing new to fill up the vacuity, the strange, but certainly not incongruous, persuasion followed, that death had closed the scene here below; and accordingly, one day, the King, under that conviction, told his attendant to provide for him a full suit of black, there being, he said, a general mourning for George the Third.

From that moment the illusion operated with greater force, till it settled in a complete belief: but though the idea that disanimation had taken place became thus irrevocably fixed, it was neither attended with personal neglect, an abstraction from amusement, nor a forgetfulness of favourite objects. While the mind, to its own perceptibility, was thus removed into another sphere, the same associations continued to cheer and exercise the thoughts that had afforded delight in former days. Thus, a new world was in a manner created, peopled with recollected connexions, and stored with imaginary prospects, which, by inducing application, and exercising the fancy, saved the royal patient from suffering through excessive irritability, or falling into a gloomy despondency.

Under all the circumstances, therefore, this might be considered as a state which called for thankfulness, and in that light it was viewed by the Queen, to whom Dr. John Willis made a report every morning after breakfast; when, if it was deemed advisable, Her Majesty accompanied the physician down a private staircase into the apartment occupied by the King, with whom she sometimes entered into conversation, no other person being allowed that privilege.

From this awful spectacle of a noble intellect, reduced like a magnificent temple to ruins, and yet commanding veneration in its desolated state, we must now turn our attention to a scene of life and gaiety, where the effervescence of joy overcomes every other sentiment; and no one that takes a part in the general gladness dreams of the day of darkness to which it leads.

Under the peculiar circumstances of the royal family, the national hopes were centered in the Princess Charlotte,¹ for whose settlement and happiness the people felt so warm an interest, that much concern was expressed when the rupture of the projected union between her royal highness and the hereditary Prince of Orange was announced. The popular sentiment was certainly in favour of that alliance on many accounts, particularly as it was known to be a favourite measure of their majesties; and because the prince, from his having been wholly educated in this country, was considered as an Englishman. Nor was it ever suspected that the princess herself had any objection to the Prince of Orange, up to the arrival of the allied sovereigns, when it was discovered that her mind had taken an unaccountable impulse in opposition to the marriage; and her resolution being decidedly expressed, the negotiation ended.

Much as the heads of the family regretted this disappointment of their wishes, they were too liberal to attempt, even by remonstrance, the effecting any alteration in the sentiments of the princess: and when afterwards it was discovered that she had placed her affections upon the young Prince of Saxe Cobourg, who happened to have visited England just at that critical period, every thing was done to meet her inclinations.

Accordingly, on the twenty-first of February, 1816, this favoured youth landed at Dover, and the day following proceeded to Brighton, where Her Majesty, with the Princesses Elizabeth and Mary, were then on a visit to the Regent and his daughter. The reception of the prince was most cordial on every side; and on the fifth of the following month the Queen and princesses returned to Windsor to make preparations for the approaching nuptials, which, however, did not take place as soon as was expected, owing to the time necessarily occupied in the settlement of preliminaries, and the severe illness of Prince Leopold, who was confined at Brighton till the middle of April. On the twenty-sixth of that month, being the birth-day of the Princess Mary, the Queen gave a grand entertainment at Frogmore, where the Prince Regent was received by his royal daughter, the Prince of Saxe Cobourg, and several members of the family, attended by a numerous party of the nobility who had been invited to dine with Her Majesty on this occasion. In the evening the Regent returned to London; and three days afterwards the rest of the family followed, to be in readiness for the nuptials; the Princess Charlotte going to Carlton House, Prince Leopold to the apartments of the Duke of Clarence in St. James's Palace, and Her Majesty, with the princesses, to Buckingham House, where the next day, being the thirtieth, a drawing-room was held according to etiquette, for the purpose of giving the young prince a formal reception at the British court; and there he met his intended bride. The same evening the nuptial dresses were exhibited to the Queen, the Regent, and the princesses, all of whom made splendid presents on the joyful occasion to their illustrious relative.

At length the second of May, the day appointed for the celebration of the marriage, arrived; and public curiosity having been long excited to an event of so much national interest, the neighbourhood of the court was early thronged with impatient multitudes.

At four o'clock, the Princess Charlotte went in a carriage to the Queen's palace, to dine with Her Majesty and the princesses; but the crowd was so great in Pall-Mall, that the coachman found it necessary to return, and drive through the Park.

At about half-past seven, the royal party set off for Carlton House, the Queen, the Princess Charlotte, the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, in one carriage, and the Princesses Mary and Sophia of Gloucester in another, escorted by a troop of the Life Guards, the populace cheering them all the way. The royal family, the Duke and Duchess of Orleans, and Prince Leopold, were conducted to the royal closet, where they continued while the attendants were busied in the necessary arrangements.

All things being in readiness for the procession, Her Majesty left the closet, and moved with her attendants to the great crimson room, which was fitted up for the ceremony, and on her entrance the Prince Regent handed her to a state chair on the right side of the altar.

The whole company being assembled, the Lord Chamberlain first conducted Prince Leopold to the altar; and next the Princess Charlotte, supported on the arm of the Duke of Clarence. The marriage ceremony was then read by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and at the conclusion, the princess, after embracing her royal parent, went and respectfully kissed the Queen's hand. The new-married couple and their august relatives then returned to the private closet; soon after which the former left the palace for Oatlands; but the Queen and the Regent, with the princesses and the royal dukes, passed into the grand council chamber, where they received the congratulations of the assembled nobility.

On the sixteenth of the same month, Her Majesty held a drawing-room at Buckingham House, which was crowded to excess; and though it had been stated that the court would not begin till the hour of two, the company began to assemble as early as twelve. The line of carriages at one time extended from the palace to the end of Oxford Street; and many of the nobility, who resided in the neighbourhood of St. James's Square were under the necessity of driving in that direction to fall into the rank.

The royal pair came to the palace a little before two; and precisely at that hour the Queen and princesses entered the drawing-room, followed by their respective suites. Her Majesty having taken her usual station, the ceremony commenced, the company first addressing the Queen with their congratulations, and then passing on to the Princess Charlotte and her spouse.

The exterior of Buckingham House, as well as the interior, had the most brilliant appearance; for as the company, after having paid their respects in the drawing-room, could not leave the palace till their carriages drew up, which they were prevented from doing for a considerable time, the windows were filled with elegant women, while many persons of the first distinction, as bishops, judges, naval and military officers, with ladies and gentlemen in their splendid dresses, promenaded the court-yard and grass-plot.

At about three o'clock there was a complete cessation of progress, and the whole of the long passage to the great hall was filled by a crowd of persons of fashion, standing as close to each other as they possibly could. At last, when this splendid group came within a few feet of the door, no farther advance could be made, till an adjacent apartment was opened, which restored something like order; and then the company began to move towards the drawing-room; but soon afterwards there was a fresh check, and it became necessary to open another apartment. On going away, many of those who were near the door remained stationary above an hour before their carriages could possibly get up; and if the weather had not permitted the lawn to be resorted to, there must have been numerous faintings: but, as it was, nothing was exhausted except patience.

When the court broke up, which was not till six o'clock, the Regent remained and took a family-dinner with the Queen, and the Princesses Elizabeth and Mary; the Princesses Augusta and Sophia being at Windsor, the former in attendance on her father, and the latter confined by indisposition.

Though Her Majesty had now exceeded the ordinary period of human life, she continued to discharge the duties of her high station with great alacrity, and appeared to take uncommon delight in the amusements of the people. At the beginning of June, accompanied by three of her daughters, and the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, she went to Ascot races. As the royal intention had been previously announced, the course was thronged with genteel people; and many came from a considerable distance, drawn thither by the general expectation that the Princess Charlotte and the Prince of Cobourg would also have been present. In this, however, they were disappointed, owing to the indisposition of the princess, which, though not serious, prevented her from gratifying the curiosity of the public.

As early as five in the morning the post-road from the metropolis, as well as the cross ones leading from the populous villages and towns in the neighbourhood, were covered with vehicles, horsemen, and pedestrians, hurrying to the promised scene of pleasure. In Windsor Park there was at one time a continued line of carriages, extending for three miles. At a quarter before one, Her Majesty and the princesses, with their attendants, arrived in two carriages on the race-course, where they were received by the Duke of Gloucester and the Marquis Cornwallis as the stewards of the meeting. The liveliness of the scene, and the excellence of the sport, afforded much pleasure to the royal party; and indeed a gayer spectacle could scarcely be imagined. The weather was fine, and the sun shone out in all his brightness. On one side of the course, extending nearly a mile in a straight line, was a row of lofty stands, filled with ladies and gentlemen elegantly dressed; and at the extremity were suttling-booths, with shops, shows, and other attractions. On the right and opposite side were arranged about three hundred carriages filled with spectators. In the middle, between these lines, and during the interval of the races, countless numbers of both sexes promenaded on the green-sward, which gave to the whole an appearance of hilarity that had a very fine effect; and even royalty itself was not exempt from its influence.

During the performances of the musical band, Her Majesty, with a cheerfulness which youth might have envied, beat time with her foot, while more than one of the princesses, by the motion of their hands, seemed, in imagination at least, to accompany the minstrels on the piano.

A little incident also occurred, which evinced the kind feeling of the royal party, and their willingness, by condescending courtesy, to reward the humblest efforts that were made to afford them entertainment. An itinerant shewman, whose livelihood consisted in exhibiting three dancing puppets on a circular board, placed himself in front of the royal stand; and though the people around him turned away with contempt, he continued his performance in the hope of attracting the notice of Her Majesty, which at last he was fortunate enough to obtain; for his grotesque figures happening to catch the eye of the Princess Mary, she whispered to the Queen, who perceiving his object, deigned to look, and appeared pleased with the amusement. The effect of this attention was almost electrical; and the very persons who a few moments before despised the entertainment, as they passed along, now pressed as near as they could to become spectators: so that the poor fellow was for some time encircled by a crowd of lords and ladies, who applauded his performance, and rewarded him bountifully, in mere imitation of the royal example. This humorous scene lasted about half an hour; after which, the royal party drove down to the bottom of the course, where two splendid marquees were pitched, and abundance of refreshments provided for their accommodation.

On the twenty-second of the following month; the long-expected marriage of the Princess Mary and the Duke of Gloucester took place in the grand saloon at Buckingham House, when a numerous assembly of the royal family and various persons of distinction were present. About nine o'clock in the evening the Queen took her station on the left side of the altar in a state chair; the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, the Duchess of York, and the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, being on her left; while on the opposite side stood the Prince Regent and his royal brothers. The Duke of Cambridge introduced the bride, and presented her to the Regent, who gave her away in marriage. At the conclusion of the ceremony the royal family retired to the Queen's apartments; and in the mean time a profusion of refreshments was served round to the company, among whom Her Majesty soon re-appeared to receive their congratulations.

The remainder of this summer passed without any thing remarkable; but at the end of the year Her Majesty received the tidings of the death of her brother, the Grand Duke Charles-Louis-Frederick of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. This news was the more distressing, as the preceding accounts from Germany stated the grand duke to be in good health, after having spent some months in travelling. But on the sixth of November, about five in the morning, he was attacked by a fit of apoplexy, which deprived him of his faculties; and at four in the afternoon he expired in the presence of his second son, Duke Charles. He was born the tenth of October, 1741, lived many years in the Hanoverian service, and in 1794 succeeded his brother in the ducal honours and estates. The sovereignty which the extorted Rhenish confederacy guaranteed to him he did not exercise to the oppression of his subjects; and upon the liberation of the continent he obtained the dignity of grand duke. He was twice married, and to two sisters of the House of Darmstadt. By the first alliance he left four children; namely, his successor, the Grand Duke George-Frederick-Charles, born in 1779, and the wives of the Duke of Hildburghausen, the Prince of Tour and Taxis, and the Duke of Cumberland. By the second marriage he left one son, Duke Charles-Frederick-Augustus.

560 DEATH OF THE DUKE OF MECKLENBURG.

CHAPTER XXIX.

State of Her Majesty's Health.—Spasmodic Attack.—Recovery.—Eton Montem.—Entertainment at Frogmore.—Case of the Reverend Mr. Roper.—Royal Visit to Bath.—Death of the Princess Charlotte.—Its Effects on the Queen, who returns to Windsor.—Calumny refuted.—Reflections on that Event.

THOUGH the infirmities of age were now perceptible, Her Majesty's habitual equanimity of temper, and general liveliness of spirits, prevented them from being burthensome to herself, or irksome to others, for which this reason was alleged by herself, that she hardly knew what tedium was, every minute in the day being regularly occupied. This was the constant antidote to the cares and troubles of which the Queen had no common share for a person in her high station. The recent death of her brother, and the attack upon her son in his return from the House of Lords on the twenty-eighth of January, 1817, gave her considerable uneasiness, and had a visible effect upon her health. No alarming symptoms, however, were indicated till the twenty-second of April, when preparations were making for a drawing-room to be held on the morrow, being St. George's Day. In the course of the night Her Majesty was seized with a spasmodic affection, which rendered a consultation of physicians necessary, and the following bulletin was issued:—"The Queen has had a cold, attended by some fever, and pain in the side: Her Majesty found the pain severe in the night, but it is much abated this morning." Though there was too much reason to apprehend that an important viscus was the seat of disease, such was the excellence of Her Majesty's constitution, and the attention of the physicians, that she recovered from this attack; and on the twenty-sixth of the same month her convalescence was officially announced. Still it was deemed adviseable that she should forbear the fatigue necessarily attendant upon the ceremonies of a drawing-room, at least for some time; and public notice to that effect was accordingly circulated.

On the twenty-seventh of May, Her Majesty, the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, with their attendants, went to Eton College to be present at the Montem, a festival which had frequently before been honoured by royal visits. Soon afterwards the Prince Regent arrived from London; and in a short time the procession began to move, according to the accustomed form, preceded by the bands of the Guards, amidst the greatest assemblage of beauty and fashion that had been known on a similar occasion for many years.

As the young gentlemen passed along, they received the usual gratuities, under the name of Salt, from all the spectators; the sum so collected amounting to somewhat more than seven hundred pounds, being an outfit for the captain of the school, then elected off to the university.

On the following day, the scholars, in their montem dresses, headed by their tutors, went in procession to Frogmore, where they partook of an elegant entertainment in the gardens, in the presence of the Queen, and a numerous party of Her Majesty's friends, who were invited to the pleasing scene.

On the eighteenth of August, Her Majesty, the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, Princess Sophia of Gloucester, with several persons of distinction, paid a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough at White Knights, in Berkshire. The royal party arrived about noon, and after taking refreshment, proceeded in open carriages round the gardens and pleasure-grounds of this delightful place. The day, though cloudy, was pleasant; and the park and lawn were rendered very lively by groups of company from Reading, and other places in the neighbourhood. The duke's band of music was stationed in the woods; and every thing was done that could add to the enjoyment of the scene; but the extent of the grounds occupying much time in traversing, the rain began to fall before the royal visitants could complete their excursion, which circumstance obliged them to return to the mansion sooner than they intended, where they were ushered to a splendid collation, in which magnificence and hospitality were combined for their entertainment.

A striking instance of amiable condescension and genuine goodness of heart occurred some time after this in the case of Mr. Roper, one of the minor canons of Windsor. Her Majesty being informed that this worthy divine was seized with a pulmonic complaint, which rendered him incapable of discharging his public duties, ordered that he should be attended by the royal physicians, and supplied twice a-day with every thing necessary from the castle. His malady, however, baffled all medical skill; and what rendered the circumstance of his death painfully distressing was the state of his widow, who had lain in only a week before of her tenth child, and all living.

The Queen, immediately on hearing of the demise of Mr. Roper, sent a particular friend to console the widow, with an assurance of her protection; and the same day she opened a subscription for the family herself, beginning with five hundred pounds, the effect of which was such, that in a few hours the contributions amounted to more than two thousand. A few days afterwards, Her Majesty, though very weak, visited the house of mourning; and after some interesting conversation with Mrs. Roper, relieved her with the promise that she would provide for her daughters, and request the Prince Regent to do the same for her sons.

This was at the end of October, just as Her Majesty was preparing for her journey to Bath, the physicians having considered her case as one that stood little chance of an alteration for the better, without the aid of the salutary springs of that celebrated place. Following this advice, the Queen, accompanied by the Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Clarence, left Windsor Castle on the morning of the third of November, and the same evening reached Sydney Place, where three elegant houses had been fitted up for the reception of the royal party. The next day the Queen visited the pump-room, drank the water, and afterwards took an airing on the Downs. Never did this city, the resort of invalids and fashionable loungers, display so much bustle and gaiety. Visitors poured in from all quarters hourly; and the inhabitants, particularly the trading part, made large preparations for an active and lucrative season, little thinking how soon the cloud of public calamity would damp the ardour of expectation, and cast a gloom over all their enjoyments.

On Thursday morning, after drinking the waters, Her Majesty received an address from the corporation; and about four o'clock a messenger arrived with despatches from Lord Sidmouth, stating that the Princess Charlotte had been delivered of a still-born male child, but that her royal highness was doing extremely well.

There cannot possibly be conceived a greater aggravation of evil tidings than that occasioned by a sudden extinction of hope after the previous removal of anxiety. Thus it was in the present instance, for, though the first news was affecting, yet, as it brought an assurance of safety in regard to the state of the princess, the disappointment of other hopes was less sensibly felt.

At six o'clock, therefore, the Queen sat down, with her usual party of fourteen, to dinner, and appeared tolerably composed; but in about an hour another messenger arrived, with a despatch directed to General Taylor, who was privately called out of the room, a circumstance that struck the Queen as very extraordinary, but on which she made no remark till the Countess of Ilchester withdrew in the same abrupt manner; and then her fears realizing the cause at once, she exclaimed, "I know what is the matter;" and fell into a fit.

After some time, she was sufficiently recovered to be led into her private apartment, accompanied by the Princess Elizabeth, whose distress was not less than that of her venerable parent.

That night, and the following day, passed in silent anguish, while it seemed all around as if each individual had been deprived of a bosom friend, and that every family had lost a near relative.

Though the royal party left Bath as early as seven on Saturday morning, they did not arrive at Windsor till six in the evening.

The next day the Prince Regent came in a very private way to see the Queen and princesses, who were soon after joined by the Duchess of Gloucester, forming a very melancholy group; yet deriving from this meeting, and the reciprocation of sorrow, something like relief under the pressure of such a heavy affliction.

From this time to the funeral, Her Majesty and the princesses remained at the castle in a state of seclusion, with the exception of about an hour every day, when, by the special direction of the physicians, they took an airing in the little park; though this was done in the most private manner possible, with no other attendant than a single footman.

The universal concern excited by this mournful event did honour to the public feelings; but the sympathy which the affecting circumstances of the case produced would have been more satisfactory had it been unmingled with prejudices, and untainted by calumny. When the people lamented the extinction of the national hopes, they should have gratefully remembered the bright example of virtue which for so long a period had enlightened the country. Of the future, no determinate judgment could be formed ; but the history of more than half a century laid an obligation upon every individual in the kingdom to think well, and speak reverently, of the august personage whose uniform conduct and purity of heart had for so long a period given unexampled dignity to the British court. Slanderers, however, rose in this hour of sorrow ; and what was worse, their vile insinuations were so credulously received, and industriously circulated, that it was impossible to remove the ill impression which they produced. The most ungenerous and cruel reflections were made upon the Queen, on account of her absence at such a critical juncture ; and some even went the length of saying that the journey to Bath was a measure of set purpose, that she might have a pretext for being out of the way. Now the truth is, the Queen, instead of hastening her departure, delayed it on this very account ; and, notwithstanding the urgent recommendation of the physicians, she would not have gone thither till after the delivery of the princess, if her royal highness had not peremptorily declined the offer which Her Majesty made to be at Claremont on that occasion. To this wish and intention the princess not only appeared decidedly adverse, but she made it a point of seconding the advice of the medical gentlemen, by saying that she should be most unhappy if on her account the Queen protracted what was deemed so necessary for her own health.

This is a simple statement of plain facts, the verity of which it would be easy to prove by indubitable testimony; and they who best knew the princess will admit, that when on mature consideration she had once taken up her resolution, no persuasion in the world could induce her to alter it.

In the present case, the propriety of the determination cannot be questioned, for the suffering of the royal patient would have been rather heightened than abated by witnessing the anxiety of one whose age and infirmities were so ill able to bear the fatigue and wretchedness unavoidable on such occasions.

It should be observed, also, that there was nothing in the previous circumstances of the princess to give the slightest room for apprehension; but that, on the contrary, her constitutional energy afforded the strongest grounds for the confident expectation of a happy result. On this account, therefore, the shock came with redoubled force, because it was a catastrophe which no person could have dreaded.

That it was a national loss, and one which called for general sorrow, the expression of the public feeling sufficiently evinced; yet, if amidst the lamentation which it raised, the hand of Providence was not acknowledged, there may be reason to fear that this has been a stroke of the divine judgment for benefits long abused, and only the prelude to evils which a thankless people have too much deserved.

The reader of history, who traces the causes and consequences of great events, will find, in perusing the annals of this country, that there never yet occurred an instance bearing a resemblance to the present, but what was productive of incidents, the effects of which have extended to distant generations.

Thus, to name a few only: the death of Prince Arthur, the eldest son of Henry the Seventh, occasioned the abolition of the papal authority in these realms;—that of Edward the Sixth, by giving the same power a temporary revival, rendered it so odious, that Elizabeth was enabled, through a long life, and a vigorous administration, to establish the reformed church of England on a steady basis;—in the succeeding reign, the demise of Henry Prince of Wales gave the crown to his brother, the unfortunate Charles, and thus prepared the way for two revolutions;—and last of all, when the hopes of the nation rested upon the young Duke of Gloucester, the last child of Princess Anne of Denmark, his premature removal left the succession open to the House of Brunswick,—in which line of hereditary right may the throne continue to flourish, under the divine protection, till all earthly dominion shall attain its consummation!

CHAPTER XXX.

Return to Bath.—Visit to Bristol.—Female Institution at Bailbrook House.—Similar Establishments recommended.—Return to Windsor.—Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth.—Her Majesty's last Drawing-Room.—Examination of The National Schools.—The Queen taken suddenly ill.—Partial Recovery.—More Royal Marriages.—Residence at Kew.—Parliamentary Regulation.—Ineffectual Attempts to remove the Queen.—Alarming Progress of her Malady.—Painful Sufferings.—Death.—Funeral.—Conclusion.

HER MAJESTY returned to Bath at the end of November, and a few days afterwards made her promised visit to the ancient city of Bristol, which place had not received a Queen of England within its walls since Anne of Denmark, the consort of James the First. The romantic prospects in the immediate vicinity, particularly the sublime view from Clifton Hill, afforded a rich treat to Her Majesty and the Princess Elizabeth, who, notwithstanding the keenness of the air, stood for some time on the high cliff which overhangs the Avon, and contemplated with astonishment the magnificent spectacle which presented itself on every side. From hence the royal party proceeded slowly to the mansion of Colonel Baillie; and after staying there about two hours, set off again for Bath, amidst the acclamations of thousands, who lined the road all the way between the two cities.

But neither these enjoyments, nor the virtue of Bladud's boasted springs, could renew an enfeebled constitution, or ward off the encroachments of disease. It was, however, pleasing to observe that under much weakness there was a placidity of mind, which, though it could not altogether subdue pain, had the happy effect of rendering it less acute and distressing. In all her cares and sufferings, the Queen was never at a loss for subjects to exercise her thoughts, in diligent enquiry, and benevolent attention.

While at Bath, she repeatedly visited Bailbrook House, an establishment of a very singular description, and of which she was not only the immediate patroness, but a liberal supporter. This institution, which may be denominated without any impropriety a reformed monastery, appears to have been modelled upon the plan of a society formed in the early part of the reign of Charles the First, by the excellent Mr. Nicholas Ferrar and his family, at Little Gidding, in Huntingdonshire. There are also many communities of a similar kind in the Protestant states on the continent; and the Moravians, as they are called, have long been distinguished by this species of social union.

The establishment of Bailbrook House offers a desirable residence to ladies of respectable character, whose birth places them in the rank of gentlewomen: and the plan has been so arranged as to suit those who have but a very moderate income; while at the same time it offers accommodation to others, who, by their residence in the establishment, contribute largely towards its support: but this occasions no distinction among the inmates, for all are, in fact, equally independent of pecuniary obligation either to the public or each other. The society live together as one family; but none are admitted who have any aversion to a retired life, or who are unwilling to co-operate in promoting works of charity and piety.

The institution is principally intended for the reception of the widows and daughters of clergymen, and of officers of the army and navy. It is entirely under the auspices of ladies of the highest rank; and a fund amounting to some thousands has been already secured for its support. The Queen, who, from its incipient state, was its warm friend and zealous promoter, took great delight in looking over every part of the building; and repeatedly expressed her wish that there were more establishments of the kind in England. It deserves consideration, also, whether social institutions, constructed on a like principle, would not be equally advantageous to gentlemen in declining years, unencumbered, and of limited incomes. Certain it is, that many persons in easy and independent circumstances become miserable for the want of agreeable companions, the reciprocation of sentiment, and a friendly stimulus to beneficial exercise.

Such a sodality, therefore, as the one here recommended, seems to be well calculated to render the downhill passage of life comfortable, by freeing the mind from the evil of inaction, which is the great bane of existence, and too often the predisposing cause of suicide.

Though it was hardly to be expected that the Queen, at her advanced age, could derive any radical benefit from the Bath waters, the malady, which had entrenched itself too deeply in the system to admit of an actual cure, was hereby suspended; and she returned to Windsor apparently with recruited strength, which constant exercise and change of scene contributed for some time to maintain. But there is nothing, however innocent and necessary, in the pursuits of eminent persons, that the evil-minded cannot turn into ridicule or reproach. Thus the tongue of scandal ascribed the excursions which Her Majesty made to Brighton, Bath, and other places, to an unbecoming gaiety of disposition, when it was sufficiently clear that health alone was the object; and that in these indulgencies it was not the love of pleasure, but the advice of medical men that was followed.

In general; as age advances the attachment to life becomes more tenacious, especially where a long course of health has been enjoyed, and where many tender connexions exist, upon whose friendly offices the mind reposes in the remainder of its journey.

The Queen felt as most do who have reason to reflect upon the past with pleasure, and who still possess an endearing tie that gives a charm to life, even though it be worn to a state of almost imperceptible exility. The vale of years was cheered by the presence and attention of affectionate children; but there was yet another relative, who, though shut out from the world, was a world to her, and for whose sake it was her wish to live, that she might watch over him in his insulated condition, and minister such occasional comfort as the state of his mind could bear. Whenever, therefore, Her Majesty left Windsor, it was with a degree of reluctance; and on her return she invariably alighted at the entrance near the apartments of the King, to see whom, she immediately went with one of the physicians in attendance.

On the twenty-sixth of February, 1818, the Queen was enabled to undergo the fatigue of a drawing-room, at Buckingham House, which, being the first after the death of the Princess Charlotte, was very numerously attended, though it had rather a sombrous appearance.

Preparations were now making for the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, with the hereditary Prince of Hesse Homburg, a union that had received the sanction of Her Majesty and the Regent some months before, but was prevented from taking place in consequence of the late lamentable breach in the family. Every point being satisfactorily settled, the nuptials were celebrated at the Queen's Palace on the evening of the seventh of April, with considerable grandeur, in the presence of Her Majesty, the Duke of York, in the absence of the Prince Regent, giving away the hand of his sister.

On the twenty-third of the same month the Queen held her last drawing-room, which was excessively crowded in consequence of the recent marriage; but it was evident to all that Her Majesty made painful exertions, and sacrificed much personal ease on this occasion, to gratify her numerous visitors.

But though this was the last act of royal splendour in which the Queen engaged, it was not her last appearance in public; for on the following week she went to the Mansion House, to witness the examination of the children educated in the national schools. When the royal intention was made known to the chief magistrate, intimation was at the same time given that Her Majesty wished to enter the city in as private a manner as possible, and therefore desired that all form and ceremony should be omitted. Every precaution, however, was adopted to preserve order in the streets through which the carriages were to pass; and the Queen expressed herself highly pleased with the reception which she had experienced in this last visit to the metropolis. There were present in the Egyptian Hall, in the presence of Her Majesty, several members of the royal family, the lord mayor, aldermen, and a great number of persons of distinction, among whom were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London.

The Prince of Hesse Homburg stood on the left of the Queen, who was attended by the Earl of Harcourt, the Earl of Morton, and the ladies in waiting. The business commenced with the introduction of the children into the centre of the hall, consisting of between two and three hundred girls, and more than double that number of boys, making in all about one thousand of different ages. When they were all arranged, they sung a hymn, and repeated parts of the church service; after which the greater part was dismissed, and each class then introduced in succession. On a word being given, the children spelt the same, and wrote it down on their slates. They then performed arithmetical exercises in a similar manner, and read several chapters of the scriptures. The whole had a very impressive effect, and afforded much delight to Her Majesty, who conversed very cheerfully with Mrs. Fry, the quaker, and several other ladies; as also with the clergymen who examined the children.

To the funds of the society for carrying on this noble work, the Queen presented five hundred pounds; and her example was followed by the Prince Regent, the Duke of York, and others of the family.

At this time Her Majesty appeared much better than she had been for some months past; and when the lord mayor went the next day to pay his respects at Buckingham House, he was agreeably informed, that so far from being impaired, the health of the Queen was improved by her visit to the city, and the pleasure which she had there received.

But this was merely one of the transient gleams which occasionally brighten up the wintry day of human life. About a week after this Her Majesty suffered a sudden and violent spasmodic attack, as she sat at dinner at the Duke of York's; in consequence of which she was confined to her room till the latter end of May, when, by the diligent attention of Sir Henry Hallford, she recovered sufficiently to witness the re-marriage of the Duke of Cambridge and the Princess of Hesse. This ceremony took place at Buckingham House, on the first of June; and two days afterwards Her Majesty had to undergo the severe trial of parting from a beloved daughter, who, with the prince her husband, left town for Brighton, there to remain a few days, that if in case the Queen should feel the separation so acutely as to have a relapse, her royal highness might return and wait the issue. Her Majesty, however, with that self-command which invariably distinguished her through life, endured the sacrifice in a manner that surprised even those who were no strangers to her habitual fortitude. The struggle, indeed, was an arduous one on both sides; and it was embittered by the afflicting consideration, that they who had scarcely lived apart for a single day, through a long course of years, would see each other's face in this world no more. Thus the Queen saw herself bereft of some of her dearest connexions, when she stood in most need of their consoling presence; and though the settlement of her children afforded satisfaction, it was under such circumstances as precluded the hope of witnessing their felicity.

Being desirous of seeing the King, and spending her last hours under the same roof with him, Her Majesty left town for Kew, that she might be nearer the object of her wishes, little thinking, that, short as the distance was, she should never behold Windsor any more.

The expected arrival of the Dukes of Clarence and Kent, with their respective brides, delayed her departure till it became impossible that she could proceed any farther without running the risk of dying on the road.

On Sunday evening, the seventh of July, she appeared much better, and expressed an inclination to take a little excursion. Accordingly, the coach was ordered, and the Queen entered it, accompanied by the Princess Augusta, the Duchess of Gloucester, and a lady in waiting. After a ride of about an hour, Her Majesty was taken so very ill that the princesses were obliged to stop the carriage, while they endeavoured to relieve the sufferings of their revered parent. When the carriage moved again, it went at a very slow pace; and on reaching the palace, the attendants had great difficulty in conveying the Queen into the house, where she lay near a quarter of an hour in a most distressing condition.

By the sedulous attentions of the physicians, however, the royal invalid was so far recovered as to be able to sit in the saloon on the following Saturday, during the solemnization of the nuptials of the Dukes of Clarence and Kent; though she was unable to dine with the company afterwards.

Thus were the hymeneal rites performed in the anti-chamber of death; and the Queen might have said, as she contemplated the quick succession of these new relations, "they come like shadows, and so depart;" for if they did light up a momentary spark of delight in her mind, it was extinguished by the reflection that the sensation would in a short space be obliterated for ever.

The nature of the disorder under which Her Majesty laboured was so unequivocally marked, as to admit of neither doubt nor hope. The anasarcaous symptoms, indeed, had been so long apparent, and the consequences foreseen, that ministers, before the dissolution of parliament, thought it prudent to bring in a bill to amend the regency act, with respect to the custody of His Majesty's person, in case of the demise of the Queen. But though it was evident to every other person that this event could be at no great distance, the royal patient herself entertained hopes of at least a partial recovery. With the anxiety of the dove, she panted to take up her rest at Windsor; and as this was the only impatience she betrayed amidst all her sufferings, it may be truly said to have supported her under them, by having the effect of keeping her thoughts in constant exercise and buoyant expectation.

To relieve her spirits, though with little idea of being able to gratify her wishes, various mechanical contrivances were thought of for rendering the motion of a carriage perfectly easy. None of these schemes, however, were found, upon trial, to answer the principal purpose for which they were intended; but the Queen obtained some benefit from a kind of chair that ran upon cylinders, and in which she was occasionally drawn round the gardens. A couch, constructed on similar principles, was also serviceable within doors, by the facility with which it could be moved from one room to another, and by its having a rising and falling back, which enabled Her Majesty to take repose without exertion, or the inconvenience of being shifted by her attendants.

Through the remainder of July the Queen suffered very much from frequent paroxysms, which exhausted her strength, destroyed the appetite, and deprived her of the refreshment of sleep.

At the beginning of August she seemed to be somewhat better, and continued for about a fortnight to improve in such a manner, as to excite some hopes that she would recover sufficiently to bear a removal to Windsor: but these were mere illusory appearances, which soon vanished; and before the expiration of the month, the spasmodic attacks came on again with renewed violence, each leaving the royal sufferer in a state of complete exhaustion and debility. This warfare in the system, between a constitution naturally excellent, and a complication of ailments, springing from one diseased organ, went on without abatement till the end of September, when the malady once more subsided, through the skill and exertions of the physicians; and Her Majesty was again enabled to bear a removal from the bed-chamber to the adjoining room, where she resumed something like regular meals, and saw a few select visitors.

The arrival of General Campbell, with letters from the Prince and Princess of Hesse Homburg, contributed much to this temporary recovery, which, however, was of short duration; for, on Monday evening, the nineteenth of October, the Queen became extremely restless, with a considerable degree of fever; and in the course of the night the spasmodic attacks were rapid and excruciating. Throughout the whole of the next day she suffered exceedingly from a painful tension in the right side, accompanied by a short hectic cough; and the night passed without any sleep. On Wednesday the virulent symptoms increased, and another sleepless night followed; but about noon on Thursday the paroxysms abated in some degree, and Her Majesty sunk into a state of lethargic repose. The two succeeding days went over without any severe attack, and some relief was procured by the application of the warm bath to the extremities; but it was manifest that nothing more could be done than to alleviate the sufferings of the royal patient as much as possible, and to blunt the acuteness of the shaft of death. Hence, opiates were administered to induce repose; and cordials were copiously given to keep up the animal strength. The crisis, however, was fast approaching, and the only wonder was how it could have been so long protracted, under the many sharp and tremendous conflicts which the royal patient had endured. In an early stage of Her Majesty's illness, one of the physicians gave it as his private opinion that she would not outlive the first week in November; and at the period predicted the disorder assumed an aspect of deadly malignity, that evinced the correctness of his judgment. On the night of the fifth, a great alteration took place; and the fits of coughing were so violent, that the medical attendants thought the termination of Her Majesty's sufferings was at hand. The Prince Regent, who had been dining with his sisters on that day, did not, in consequence, leave the palace till a considerable time after midnight, when the irritation had somewhat subsided by repeated applications of the warm bath and topical fomentations. Throughout the remainder of the night, however, and the whole of the next day, the sufferings of the Queen were extremely distressing; and though, by the free use of opiates, a little temporary slumber was obtained, nothing like an alleviation of pain could be procured. - Thus, the malady went on from day to day with increasing virulence; and whatever alteration occurred in the progress of it only aggravated the afflictions of the sufferer, who might have adopted the language of the patriarch: "I am made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed unto me: When I lie down, I say, when shall I arise, and the night be gone? And I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day." But if the Queen was made to mourn, like Job, she had also that spirit of meekness which enabled her to bear the heavy trial without murmuring; and through the whole of this severe visitation not one complaining word ever escaped her lips. Here patience had its perfect work; and the triumph of faith was never more strongly displayed during a long and excruciating illness than it was in the present instance. This was not stoical apathy, but pious resignation to the divine will; and as from early youth Her Majesty had studied the principles and practised the duties of religion, she now abundantly experienced the power of its consolations in the hour of need. Next to the support derived from the promises of the gospel, on which she relied with unshaken confidence, the Queen received the greatest comfort from the unremitted attentions of her children. Nothing could exceed the filial tenderness and unwearied exertions of the Princesses Augusta and Mary, who ministered day and night by the couch of their afflicted parent; nor did either of them once leave the palace during the whole mournful period of care and sorrow.

The Prince Regent also was equally affectionate, devoting as much time as he possibly could to the same pious duty; and when he was necessarily absent from Kew, messengers waited upon him hourly with a report of the state of Her Majesty. All indeed that could be done by sympathy or solicitude, watchfulness and obedience, was readily and anxiously performed, to ameliorate the sufferings of the royal patient, who, on her part, feelingly expressed her sense of the affectionate kindness with which she was treated by the whole of her family.

But while on every countenance the look of cloudy apprehension was strongly marked, that of the royal sufferer displayed uncommon serenity, and even cheerfulness.

When the lethargic symptoms disappeared, her mind seemed to rise above bodily pain; and the powers of conversation were renewed with an energy that surprised all her friends and attendants. The most extraordinary thing of all, however, was the persuasion which prevailed in Her Majesty's thoughts almost to the very last that she should yet recover, and once more have the satisfaction of seeing the King. This was the cord which kept its firm hold upon life, when every hour gave fresh indications of dissolution. Amidst convulsive pangs; and the difficulty of finding rest, in a frame worn out by disease, the mind continually pointed in one direction, though the object of attraction was in a state of desolation and darkness. As long as this hope tended to cheer the spirits, it met with no discouragement; but when, from certain gan-grénous appearances, it became evident that the last scene was near at hand, Her Majesty received the respectful suggestion that it would be proper to delay no longer the final settlement of her temporal affairs. This was only the day before her death; but though at first somewhat shocked by the intimation, she betrayed no symptoms of impatience. On the contrary, she immediately dictated her will to General Taylor; and having signed and delivered the instrument in due form, she calmly resigned herself to the approaching event. In the afternoon she sunk into a lethargic state; and so little was any immediate change expected, that at six o'clock Sir Henry Halford's carriage was ordered to convey him on his usual visit to Windsor. Scarcely, however, had the carriage drawn up to the door, when Her Majesty manifested such an increase of perturbation, as induced him to delay his departure; and soon afterwards the journey was put off for the night. Letters were in consequence despatched to the Prince Regent, who, accompanied by the Duke of York, arrived at the palace about ten o'clock; and after a short interview with the physicians, their royal highnesses, with the princesses, went into the sick chamber to see their august parent, who, however, was unconscious of their presence. From that hour till midnight the symptoms of the disorder developed themselves in such alarming succession, that the

Regent determined to spend the night at Kew, which design he abandoned on finding that an abatement of suffering had taken place; and he returned with his brother to town. They had not been long gone before a fresh attack came on; and throughout the remainder of the night the Queen was almost in continual agony; the physicians, with Mr. Brande, remaining in the anti-chamber, and the princesses in the room with their parent, till the morning was far advanced.

At half-past nine, on Tuesday the seventeenth, the bulletin was forwarded to town in the customary manner; but the bearer had not left the palace more than three quarters of an hour, when Her Majesty became so much worse, that a second messenger was hastened to Carlton House, to request the immediate attendance of the Prince. Couriers were also sent off to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several other persons whose presence was desirable; and every thing plainly indicated the immediate approach of the last awful crisis.

The Prince Regent and the Duke of York reached the palace a little after twelve o'clock; and immediately on their arrival Sir Henry Hallford announced to them and their illustrious sisters the speedy termination of all their affectionate cares, which operated very powerfully upon their feelings, though for several weeks they had been fully prepared for the catastrophe. Their royal highnesses then moved into the chamber of death, and surrounded the bed on which their venerable parent lay reclined; soon after which she became conscious of their presence, held out her hand to the Prince, and while in the act of grasping his, and smiling upon them all, exactly at twenty minutes past one, without a sigh or a struggle, she breathed her last, thus experiencing, after the most arduous trials and perilous conflicts, at the end of her course,

A death-like sleep,

A gentle wafting to immortal life.

The same evening a special gazette, supplementary to the regular one, was published in the following words :

Whitehall, Nov. 17.

“ This day, at one o'clock, the QUEEN departed this life, to the inexpressible grief of the royal family, after a tedious illness, which Her MAJESTY bore with the most pious fortitude and resignation. The many great and exemplary virtues which so eminently distinguished Her MAJESTY throughout her long life were the object of universal esteem and admiration amongst all classes of His MAJESTY's subjects, and render the death of this illustrious and most excellent princess an unspeakable loss to the whole nation.”

On Tuesday, the first of December, the ceremony of lying-in-state took place, though on a contracted scale; and the next day the mortal remains of Her Majesty were deposited in the royal sepulchre at Windsor, of which solemnities ample particulars will be found in the Appendix.

CONCLUSION.

THUS have we followed, from her birth to the tomb, this illustrious personage, above fifty-seven years of whose life were spent in the full view of the British nation. Throughout the whole of that eventful period not a single instance was ever adduced of her having exercised the least influence in support of any particular line of politics, or in promoting the interests of any set of favourites. Faction itself, in the worst of times, was always dumb in regard to the public conduct of the Queen, while to her private virtues universal homage was willingly paid. In the discharge of the relative duties she stood unrivalled; and if she kept up the decorum of her court with unbending strictness, she did it without prejudice or partiality. Neither friendship nor consanguinity, power nor solicitation, could obtain a relaxation of the rule which she had laid down for the exclusion of improper persons from the royal circle.

The great difficulty of observing this law in a country where principle must often yield to expediency, is a proof of the integrity of Her Majesty, who, amidst all the violence of party, maintained her stand with undeviating firmness.

On a similar ground she formed her household; and being once surrounded by persons whose virtue she approved, no consideration could prevail upon her to abandon them for new connexions. Some attempts to this effect were made by a greedy administration; but the resolution of the Queen soon compelled the meddlers to recede from their purpose. Hence it was that a train of domestics and attendants became grey in the royal service; so that the virtues cultivated there spread their influence in an exemplary manner, but without ostentation, throughout the land. May we not, therefore, safely say, that next to the decision of the national councils, under the blessing of Divine Providence, these realms are indebted for their preservation to the character of the court?—Certain it is, that while this steady moral light irradiated Britain, the courts on the continent, both great and small, exhibited a very different picture; the consequence of which was, that when the revolutionary volcano exploded, they wanted virtue to stem the torrent. It is true, the retired life of their majesties was sometimes reflected upon, as indicative of pride or parsimony, but very unjustly; for no persons of their supreme rank could be more easy of access, or condescending in their manners; and though a splendid life did not comport with their inclination, they supported their establishments with dignity, and were constantly exercised in works of benevolence. A more magnificent style might, indeed, have attracted the admiration of the thoughtless, but it would neither have conduced to private felicity, nor have suited the habits of the people. The course which their majesties early adopted, and invariably pursued, secured domestic happiness, and general respect, though it could not escape the ridicule of fools, and the censure of the wicked.

In this choice the King and Queen acted by a conjunction of sentiment; for as their hearts were cemented by the purest affection, so they had a perfect similarity of taste. Had it been otherwise, the difference must have been seen in the course of half a century; and as nothing of the kind was ever observed, or alleged, it is a proof that the mind of the sovereign and that of his consort were in perfect unison. Such indeed was the harmony which subsisted between them, that it is difficult, in the estimation of character, to separate them from each other. Great liveliness of temper distinguished both; and this cheerfulness appeared in the freedom of their conversation, which was ever unre-served, except on politics, or where private reputation might be affected. In such cases they always observed so strict a silence as to put a complete bar against flatterers and tale-bearers. Though doubtless they had their attachments, and both were well acquainted with the history of all the great families in the kingdom, they made it a point never to give cause of offence either to public parties or private individuals.

How well the Queen, in particular, bore her faculties, by steering clear of national concerns, appeared conspicuously when the great question of the regency was first agitated. Amidst the uproar occasioned by the obscuration of the royal intellect, Her Majesty evinced a mind of no ordinary vigour; and yet, while she watched with the most sedulous attention over the suspended rights of her husband, she intermeddled not with the public proceedings, so as to wound the feelings of her son. This is a fact, though a late right reverend biographer has asserted the contrary, in a memoir of himself, so full of contradictions, that the poison and the antidote may commonly be found in the same page.

Subsequently she has been reflected upon as having indulged too great a partiality for the Princè; and they who pretended to have discovered that fault, went so far as to charge Her Majesty with widening a family breach which she should have healed.

Into the cause of that rupture it would be impertinent to make any inquiry; but thus much may be affirmed; without any hazard of denial, that if any one was injured more than another, it was the Queen herself, whose patience underwent many severe trials, which as none but Christian fortitude could have borne, so none but a Christian could have forgiven.

But the accusation most strongly urged and extensively accredited against Her Majesty was that of excessive penuriousness. This allegation was so often made, that at length numbers who wished otherwise were almost afraid that it must be true. The Queen was not ignorant of this aspersion, and yet she took no steps to clear herself from it; for the soundest of all reasons, since, as she observed, if she began to make a parade of benevolence, or performed something out of the common course, it would be said that this was done to remove a stigma, or to acquire popularity. She, therefore, very judiciously, went on in her usual course, dealing out charity liberally, but silently, and keeping close to her Saviour's precept, "Not to let the left hand know what the right hand did." To this rule, as far as could be practised, she adhered all her life, and nothing hardly ever gave her more uneasiness than to have any act of her munificence made known to the world.

Her constant injunction to those who had the disposal of her bounty was to keep the quarter from whence it came carefully concealed; and a violation of this direction was the sure way to incur her displeasure. A lady, who had been the bearer of a considerable largess to a distressed family, was afterwards asked whether she had mentioned the matter to any person; and on being told that only another lady high in Her Majesty's confidence was made acquainted with it, "Then," said she, "there is one too many."

But though she could not endure the blazoning of her good deeds, she was always happy when her almoners exercised their discretion, by giving more than their verbal commission apparently authorised them to bestow.

The wife of a labouring man at Old Windsor, with a large family, and in great distress, was brought to bed of twins; which being communicated to Her Majesty, she gave the informant twenty pounds to be laid out for their benefit. In doing this, the person found that the sum would be inadequate to purchase clothing for all the children, and to redeem the poor man's apparel and tools from the pawnbroker's. Relying, however, on the Queen's goodness, she ventured to add another twenty pounds to the royal donation; and on making her report, which she did with some apologies, Her Majesty stopped her by expressing the warmest approbation of her conduct, and graciously saying that she took it as a particular obligation.

All persons who knew the Queen felt the utmost confidence on approaching her with a narrative of woe, because they were not only assured of meeting with a willing audience, but of receiving an ample contribution.

In the year 1779, when the Quebec frigate, Captain Farmer, was blown up after an action of four hours and a half off Brest, and only seventeen persons were saved, the Queen took a tender interest in the concerns of Mrs. Farmer, for whom, and her family, she procured a pension of eight hundred a-year. Another instance of her sympathetic feeling occurred at the same time, and connected with the same melancholy event. One of the persons saved from the Quebec was Mr. William Moore, the master's mate. But though he was taken up alive, he was dreadfully wounded. The pitiableness of his case being mentioned to Her Majesty by Mr. Ashburner, her silk-mercier, she caused her own physician and surgeon to attend Mr. Moore, and on his recovery obtained for him a lieutenant's commission; not long after which, through the same interest, he rose to the rank of master and commander.

The readiness of the Queen to receive applications, and her promptitude to grant substantial relief in cases of real distress, will appear from another instance.

One day a female, wholly unknown to Her Majesty, and without being introduced, presented a petition at Windsor. The memorial stated that she was the widow of an officer, and left with twelve children wholly unprovided for. The Queen directed the strictest inquiries to be made into the character of the applicant; and the result being satisfactory, she took the whole of the children from the mother, and sent them to school. Some time after, however, the lady married a person in opulent circumstances, on which Her Majesty very properly sent back the children, that her bounty might be transferred to objects who stood in real need of it.

How wrongfully the Queen was charged with being of a parsimonious disposition, the following schedule of her annual payments in works of benevolence will clearly shew.

	£.	s.	d.
In pensions and allowances to retired servants and other persons, a total sum of.....	4,311	16	0
To the support of a female charity for needle-work, established in Bedfordshire, Her Majesty contributed more than fifty years the yearly subscription of.....	500	0	0
To the Ladies' Association (at Bailbrook House)	100	0	0
St. Martin's Charity School	31	10	0
Cheltenham ditto	10	10	0
Westminster Infirmary	31	10	0
Infirmary for diseases of the eyes.....	52	10	0
Infirmary at Windsor.....	52	10	0
Queen's School at Windsor.....	120	0	0

	£.	s.	d.
Ladies' School at the same place.....	21	0	0
The Lying-in Society.....	25	0	0
Princess Elizabeth's School at Old Windsor	5	5	0
Charity School at the same place.....	5	0	0
The Bible Society	10	10	0
The Benevolent Society.....	10	10	0
The Penny Club; an institution for encouraging economy and frugality in children and servants	11	11	0
	<hr/> £ 5,299 2 0 <hr/>

Besides these stated payments, there were frequent public subscriptions, casual donations to a considerable amount, money laid out in school-books for children, and a large distribution of clothing, coals, and provisions, among the poor every winter. The consequence of all this was, that so far from having a balance in her favour at the year's end, Her Majesty generally found that she had exceeded her income. Parsimonious persons are commonly well acquainted with their pecuniary affairs, and are very attentive in keeping their accounts. This, however, was not the case with the Queen; and it was always more necessary, on the part of those who had the management of her concerns, to caution her against profuse liberality, than to encourage an increase of benevolence. While the King retained his faculties, Her Majesty was enabled to exercise her charitable disposition more widely, and without much embarrassment, because she never failed to meet with a supply for that purpose, whenever she stood in need of it; but after his illness this source was dried up; and in addition to her own pension-list, she had also the private one of His Majesty to discharge out of her pocket, unless she chose to abandon the objects who had so long subsisted on the royal bounty. This the feeling heart of the Queen could not endure, and of course for the last seven years her expenditure was so very heavy, that it is not to be wondered she should be incumbered with debts, instead of leaving, what a censorious world anticipated, 'an accumulated hoard. It should also be observed that the Queen incurred considerable expenses by the presents which she was in the habit of making to friends and persons whom she wished to oblige; and as these gifts were always new purchases, Her Majesty's rule being never to part with what she bought for herself, or had received in a complimentary way from others, it accounts for the extensive wardrobe and valuable jewels of which she died possessed, and upon which so many invidious reflections have been made.

Such was the innate goodness of the Queen; that she rather encouraged than repelled applications for her favour and bounty. None were ever suffered to pass unnoticed; and the utmost solicitude was always evinced to pay early attention to all representations, whatever might be the quarter from whence they proceeded.

In like manner Her Majesty was always anxious to express her sense of attentions shewn, or services rendered to her, although the same were performed by persons from whom she had a right to claim them.

The greatest kindness was uniformly manifested to servants of all classes; and whenever any of them, through age or infirmities, were rendered incapable of labour, they and their families were certain of receiving an adequate support. To do good, and diffuse comfort, constituted the chief pleasure of Her Majesty, whose active mind continued on the alert to the very last in devising measures of benevolence. One of her first acts, after taking up her residence at Kew, was to order a list of poor families in that neighbourhood to be made out, and suitable clothing provided, according to the number of persons in each. This was intended to be given to them on her departure to Windsor; but Providence having ordained otherwise for her, the royal bounty was bestowed upon the several objects shortly after her decease.

Among the public institutions under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty, and which for many years experienced her benefactions, were the Magdalen Hospital, the Asylum for Female Orphans, the Queen's Lying-in Hospital, the Royal Society for the Support of decayed Musicians and their Families, the Westminster Hospital and Infirmary, the Ladies' Society for educating and employing the Female Poor, and the Royal Infirmary for Diseases of the Eyes.

The Queen was very fond of reading; and her libraries at Buckingham House, Windsor Castle, and Frogmore, exhibited abundant testimonies of her taste and judgment in the choice of books. With the best authors in English, French, and German, she was familiarly acquainted, and from many of them she made copious extracts. The Bible, however, was her chief favourite, and she spared no expense in collecting works of approved value, which had for their object the elucidation of the holy oracles. From these publications she made large transcripts; and her manuscript collections of this description, all in her own hand, amount to several volumes.

Whatever tended to the diffusion of religious knowledge always met with liberal encouragement from Her Majesty, who took great pleasure in the company of such persons as applied their talents to the confirmation of divine truth, by defending revelation, and clearing up its obscurities. Among those who were thus honoured, the two venerable sages, Bryant and De Luc, were most particularly esteemed by the Queen, who often visited the former at Cypenham; and the latter, who enjoyed the situation of reader to Her Majesty above forty years, addressed a series of letters to her on the natural history of the Earth and of Man, which were afterwards published in the French language.

Though Her Majesty did not, like Queen Caroline, set up any pretensions to literature, she was an admirer of female genius, and took a pleasure in the company of ladies who had distinguished themselves by their talents and writings.

One of these was the very ingenious Mrs. Delany, the intimate friend of the Duchess-Dowager of Portland, and celebrated for her extraordinary accomplishments in embroidery, shell-work, painting, and natural history. On the death of the duchess-dowager, the King, who had frequently conversed with Mrs. Delany, at Bulstrode, was graciously pleased to assign her for a summer residence the use of a house completely furnished in St. Alban Street, Windsor, adjoining to the entrance of the castle; and, as a farther mark of the royal favour, His Majesty conferred upon her a pension of three hundred pounds a-year. The manner in which this pension was paid added to the gracefulness of the gift; for to prevent the customary deductions, the Queen herself, in the kindest, most condescending, and considerate manner, brought every half year the bank-notes in her pocket.

. In the memoirs of the life of Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, so well known for her erudition, is the following anecdote :

“ Mrs. Cartor had the happiness of reckoning among her most intimate and valued friends, Lady Charlotte Finch, and her two daughters, Mrs. Fielding and Miss Finch, and Lady Cremorne. - These ladies, who saw the Queen frequently, and were honoured by Her Majesty’s particular regard, had probably mentioned to her occasionally a friend to whom they were so warmly attached ; and, indeed, Mrs. Carter had had the honour of seeing some of the princesses in Lady Charlotte’s apartments more than once. Her Majesty was therefore pleased to desire that Mrs. Carter should be introduced to her by Lady Cremorne ; and in 1791, she received that distinguished honour at Lord Cremorne’s house at Chelsea. The Queen had the goodness to enter into conversation with her, with such engaging sweetness and condescension, as to put her very soon at her ease. The conversation lasted for about an hour, and turned, among other topics, upon German literature. After that time, Her Majesty was pleased often to enquire after Mrs. Carter of Lady Charlotte Finch and Lady Cremorne ; and several times did her the honour of lending her German books, and of sending her very flattering and obliging messages.”

The high opinion which Her Majesty entertained of Mrs. Trimmer and Mrs. Hannah More has been already stated ; and in addition to those ladies, it should be observed that Madame d'Arblay, Charlotte Smith, Helen Maria Williams, and Miss Cornelia Knight, were honoured with special marks of the royal favour.

In her choice of friends, the Queen was particularly select ; but whenever she formed an attachment it became permanent, so that the circle of her intimates at the last consisted almost of persons nearly as old as herself. But, whatever might be her private sentiments in regard to individuals, she never manifested any thing in the shape of favouritism, by which prudent course she maintained her own independence of mind, and avoided all occasion of jealousy in others.

Though her late Majesty could never be called a beautiful woman, she had an agreeableness of person which made a strong impression upon those who were admitted to her presence ; and this pleasing appearance, with an uncommon liveliness of the visual organs, continued even when the infirmities of extreme senility, and the encroaching ravages of an incurable disease, occasioned her to stoop pretty much, and when, in the striking language of the royal moralist, she found " the grasshopper to have become a burthen."

The Queen was extremely conversable, and very correct in her language, with little, if any thing, of a foreign accent, though she retained to the last a fondness for her native tongue; nor could any person please her better than by displaying an acquaintance with German literature.

Whenever any thing very particular took her fancy, either in discourse or reading, she never failed to make a memorandum of the occurrence, or to mark the passage, for farther consideration and enquiry. By this practice of taking notes of what she read, her memory became stored with a great variety of general knowledge; and thus, there were few subjects, or even authors of any consequence, that had escaped her observation.

Till of late years, she amused herself very much in drawing, for which she had a fine taste, as she also had for music; and Mary, the wife of William of Orange, could not have been fonder of her needle than the wife of George the Third.

She was, through life, exceedingly industrious; and one of the principal complaints which she made in her last illness was the want of employment. As long as health permitted, she had always some design in hand; and when her visitors frequently wondered how she got through so much, the reply was, that she never let a single hour pass unoccupied. But, if the Queen had the carefulness of

Martha, she did not suffer worldly things to engross her thoughts, and to exclude the most important of all considerations. She managed her affairs with discretion; every pursuit in which she engaged had utility for its object. An habitual sense of religion sanctified her conduct throughout life, and she discharged its several duties with perfect ease and uniform consistency. Her piety was neither austere nor enthusiastic; but a mild and steady principle, which governed her temper, enlivened her conversation, and evinced its purity in all her actions. Justly it is said by one who knew the Queen most intimately, that no person could be a more exact observer of any promise given, or engagement contracted; none more cautious of betraying a secret confided; none more scrupulous in the discrimination of property, or in claiming any thing to which a clear right was not established; and none was more anxious to avoid calling upon those about her for any service, or act, which they could not conscientiously perform.

To a Christian spirit like this, death could have no terrors; and hence it was, that though the passage out of life was dark and tempestuous, she bore the conflict with fortitude, and passed her dreary hours in prayer and meditation, the efficacy of which appeared in the serenity that beamed upon her countenance as the mortal coil drew near its close; and when the 'vital spark' had fled, left an impressive smile upon the features characteristic of that joy into which the royal sufferer, "like" the weather-beaten mariner, had at last entered.

After this extinction of a light which had shone upon Britain nearly sixty years, with unvaried brightness, an example of every practical virtue, it might have been expected that the national feeling would have marked a sense of the public loss by something more than the external garb and formal trappings of woe. The funeral of Her Majesty did indeed excite public curiosity; and in several places of worship discourses were delivered suitable to the occasion, some of which were afterwards printed; but even this token of respect was far from being general; and in one of the greatest parishes within the precincts of the court there was neither service nor sermon on that day.

Would, however, that this were the only instance of disrespect and ingratitude of which the living may justly complain, and at which posterity will not fail to wonder.

All the world now knows that so far from "making gold her hope, and fine gold her confidence," the late Queen impoverished herself in "dealing out bread to the hungry, and clothing the naked; in supporting the poor and the fatherless, and in causing the widow's heart to sing for joy."

By these good deeds, not casual ones, but constant and extensive, she has left a personal estate encumbered with debts, for the discharge of which painful sacrifices are making on the part of the representatives of Her Majesty, certainly honourable in the highest degree to themselves, but far otherwise as the case stands in regard to the nation. That the personal effects of the Queen, and, above all, the literary collections which constituted so much of the pleasure of her life, should be scattered abroad by a public sale, is discreditable in every respect; and particularly so when contrasted with the enormous settlements that have been made by parliament upon absolute strangers, for contingent benefits that have been destroyed in the moment of expectation, without leaving any thing behind but painful remembrance and a heavy expenditure.

But this is a sickening reflection, from which we turn, to close the memoir of departed excellence with the consoling language of our great moral poet :

When faith and love, which parted from thee never,
Had ripen'd thy just soul to dwell with God,
Meekly thou didst resign this earthly load

Of death, call'd life, which us from life doth sever.

Thy works and alms, and all thy good endeavour
Stay'd not behind, or in the grave were trod ;

But as Faith pointed with her golden rod,
Followed thee up to joy and bliss for ever.

Love led them on, and Faith, who knew them best,
Thy handmaids clad them o'er with purple beams
And azure wings, that up they flew so drest,
And spake the truth of thee on glorious themes
Before the Judge, who thenceforth bid thee rest,
And drink thy fill of pure immortal streams.

MILTON.

APPENDIX.

PARTICULARS OF THE LYING-IN-STATE, AND THE FUNERAL OBSEQUIES, OF HER LATE MAJESTY.

Tuesday, December the first, being the day appointed for admitting spectators to the ceremony of lying-in-state, all who were favoured with tickets were desired to be at Kew between ten and four o'clock. On entering the funeral apartments, the reason of this limitation was immediately apparent; for the house where the Queen breathed her last is only an appendage to the palace, and was used formerly as a royal nursery. Such a habitation, therefore, however comfortable it might be, was ill calculated for the pomp of state; and a numerous train of domestics would only have incommoded the visitors. Yet, the rank of the deceased required the observance of some formalities; and though the manager could not produce a magnificent appearance, he judiciously contrived to give to the scene a solemn effect.

The entrance was the front door of the palace, from the vestibule of which the spectators immediately entered the hall of state. This apartment was entirely clothed with Roman draperies of black cloth, and round the sides were placed a vast number of double wax lights in silver sconces.

The coffin was placed on a raised platform, the head under a canopied recess, and partially covered with a superb black velvet pall lined with white satin, and with three escutcheons on each side of it. Near the head was placed the coronet, on a rich cushion of crimson velvet, bordered with gold fringe, and having a large tassel of gold at each corner. On the other side of the royal coffin were three large silver candlesticks with wax lights, placed on platforms. Under the canopy at the head were the united arms, finely painted, on a lozenge-shaped hatch-

ment of white satin. At the head of the coffin, immediately under the hatchment, sat the Countess-Dowager of Harcourt, veiled with black crape, and supported by two gentlemen ushers. On each side of the coffin sat two ladies of the bedchamber, veiled also; and around the whole was a partition hung with black cloth, within which were placed, at each corner, two yeomen of the guard, in black cloth dresses, with the royal crown, and the rose, thistle, and shamrock, embroidered in gold and silver, on the breast and on the back, and having their partizans entirely covered with crape. From the state-room the company passed on through another apartment, fitted up in the same solemn manner, with black drapery and silver sconces, and thence through the passages to the gardens at the back of the palace, and so out into the carriage-road by the river.

Wednesday, the second, being the day appointed for the conveyment of the mortal remains of Her late Majesty to their "kindred dust," the roads to Kew were at an early hour crowded to excess with persons on foot, on horseback, and in all sorts of vehicles, hastening to view the melancholy procession. The public offices were all shut up, and the shops in the metropolis were closed, except those for the sale of the necessities of life. At the Exchange and the docks all business was suspended; and all who could afford it were arrayed in decent mourning.

At Kew, the honorary guard, stationed at the palace while the remains of Her late Majesty were lying-in-state, turned out at about half-past seven o'clock. The officers appeared with crape scarfs and sashes: crape was also placed round their caps, and round the hilts of their swords. They remained on duty in the front of the palace until the royal remains were removed. At eight o'clock, a detachment from the 16th lancers made their appearance, slowly moving along the Windsor road, and advancing towards Kew. They were stationed in two bodies on Kew-Green. The road, in the vicinage of the palace, was patrolled during the morning by small parties of the same regiment. At half past eight o'clock the hearse destined to convey the royal corpse to Windsor arrived at the palace. It was accompanied by fifty undertakers' assistants on horseback, in deep mourning, with silk scarfs, hat-bands, &c. and escorted by a body of lancers. The read, Kew-green, the path-ways, and every open space, was crowded with spectators and carriages. At a quarter after nine o'clock, an additional number of lancers scoured the roads, and prevented the approach of carriages, except those belonging to persons who were to take a part in the solemn ceremony. Soon after, the larger body of lancers, who had been stationed on Kew-green, moved towards the palace. A part of them formed on each side of the road, obliging the spectators to fall back pretty close to the Thames. The remainder of this body were subdivided into two parties: one to precede, and one to follow the hearse. At ten o'clock the procession was formed, and the cavalcade set out at a slow and solemn pace.—The procession having crossed the bridge, slowly moved to the left, followed by an incalculable number of persons on foot, and an immensity of carriages, by way of Brentford and Hounslow, towards Windsor. Her Majesty's private carriages were filled with the ladies, noblemen, and gentlemen, who occupied the principal situations in her household.

The procession did not reach Frogmore until seven o'clock in the evening, when it was received by a captain's guard of honour, with a standard, who mounted guard early in the day, and remained under arms to receive His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, who arrived at four o'clock, accompanied by his equerries and Viscount Jocelyn. Shortly before the arrival of the Prince Regent, the Duke of York arrived at Frogmore, to dine with his royal brother. A plain dinner was also provided, quite in a private manner, for the cabinet ministers, and some of the principal personages engaged in the procession. The Duke of Sussex arrived at Frogmore at six o'clock, after having privately dined at Datchet.

At twenty minutes past seven o'clock in the evening, the procession set out from Frogmore to St. George's chapel in the following order :

Servants and Grooms of the Royal Family, Prince Regent,
His Majesty, and Her Majesty, each bearing a flambeau.

Trumpets and kettle drums, mounted, and the drums and fifes of the foot guards.

Knight-Marshal's Men on foot (with black staves.)

The coaches of the Royal Family, all led by Servants in deep mourning.

One Coach drawn by six Greys; another by six fine Black Horses;
two drawn by six Greys, and three by six Bay Horses.

These carriages belonged to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, the Duke of Gloucester, and Prince Leopold, and contained some of the principal personages belonging to the royal household.

Eighty Servants belonging to the junior branches of the Royal Household on foot, two by two,
all in full mourning, with black staves;
eight Earl Marshal's Men, in their red and gold uniforms, with crape;

and twenty-six Horsemen, in full mourning, preceded THE HEARSE,

Drawn by eight of the late Queen's Horses, driven by her Body Coachman.

One of the King's Carriages, drawn by a full set of the King's Black Horses, conveying the Chief Mourner and his two Supporters.

Twenty Yeomen of the Guard in mourning, with partizans reversed, flanked the Hearse and Carriage.

One of the King's Carriages, drawn by six Horses, conveying the Train Bearer of the Chief Mourner.
Carriages of the King, drawn by six Horses, conveying their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York and Sussex.

An escort of Lancers flanked the Hearse and

Carriages of
of the Dukes of York and Sussex.

Carriages of the Queen which attended in the procession from Kew.

Carriages of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

Guard of Lancers which attended the Hearse to Datchet Bridge.

Foot Guards, stationary, every sixth man bearing a flambeau, lined the procession from Frogmore to St.
George's Chapel.

The whole state part of the procession consisted of twenty-three carriages, the greater part of which were drawn by six horses each. The yeomen of the guard were in full mourning, escorting each carriage.

At seven o'clock, the bell of the chapel began to toll, as an intimation that the procession had moved from Frogmore; while the marshals and the persons belonging to the Lord Chamberlain's Office began to call over, and to form those who were to precede the procession into the choir. This was managed with great decorum, and so as scarcely to disturb the general silence that reigned throughout the arcades of this noble building. The interval till eight o'clock was thus occupied; when the quick moving of lights and general bustle discovered through the windows, announced the arrival of the funeral cavalcade. When the procession had reached the south door of St. George's Chapel, the servants and grooms, the trumpets and drums, and the knight-marshals' men, filed without the door. The royal body was then removed by ten yeomen of the guard from the hearse, and placed upon a car,* entirely covered with black velvet, which was then drawn on by yeomen of the guard, who worked at its handles, but who were concealed from public view by a large velvet pall, which was thrown over the coffin, and hung down at the sides, so as to cover the men who drew the car at each side. At this moment the notes of the organ were heard, and the choir entered, each singer bearing a lighted taper in his hand, and singing the well-known anthem from Croft's burial-service. The strength and completeness of this choral band, at least treble the usual number allotted to the cathedral service, and these select members of the principal choirs in and near the metropolis, breaking in upon the silence which before prevailed, produced an effect truly solemn and impressive. The procession then entered by the south door of the chapel, nearly in the following order :

* Constructed by Sir William Congreve. On all former occasions the coffin was carried into the church on the shoulders of yeomen of the guard; but the weight was often found insupportable; and after the interment of the Princess Charlotte, it was said that one of the bearers had actually died of the injury he sustained in the performance of this duty. To obviate not only a recurrence of this injury, but even the unpleasant interruption which the change of bearers to relieve each other necessarily occasions in the church, during the performance of the solemn ceremony, this car was contrived, about five feet in height, and supported by three separate axletrees, which moved two small wheels each. The axles were constructed to swing with facility, and make a short turn in a small circle, so as to make its evolutions with ease on the platform.

Poor Knights of Windsor.

Pages of the Royal Family, Prince Regent,
King, and Queen.

II. F. Grobecker, Christopher Papendick, Wm. Duncan, and Paul Robinson, Esqrs. Gentlemen Ushers.

Quarterly Warrants to the King and Queen.

Pages of honour to the King and Queen

Apothecaries to Prince Surgeons to Prince

Regent, King, and Queen.

Curates and Rectors of Kew and Windsor.

Groom of the Privy Chamber to the King and Queen.

Gentlemen Valuers duly Waiters to the King

Third Gentleman Usher Daily Waiter to the Queen

6. The following are the names of the persons who have been 7.

Sir P^r^t Dr. Bailie

King

- chief.

Frequency to the Prince Regent.

Clerk, Marshal, and First Equerry to the Prince.

Quarter-Master-General. Adjutant General.

Clerk, Mary

Gentlemen :

to the King and Queen.

Officers of the Duchy of Cornwall.

Chamberlain to the Great Steward of Scotland

Grooms of the Bed Chamber to the King.

Master of the Robes to the King

Pursuivants

King's Solicitor-General and Attorney-General.

Queen's Solicitor-General and Attorney-General.

Comptroller and Treasurer of the King's Household.

Heralds.

Privy Purse and Private Secretary to the Prince

Private Secretary and Treasurer to the King.

Lord Chief Baron.

Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Vice Chancellor.

Master of the Rolls.

Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

Lords of the Bed Chamber to the Queen.

Groom of the Stole to the King (Windsor Establishment.)

Vice-Chamberlain to the King (Windsor Establishment,)

on the right,

and Master of the Household to the King, and Secretary to the Groom of the Stole

(Windsor Establishment), on the left.

Bishop of London, Bishop of Salisbury, Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, on the right; and Bishop of Exeter,

Clerk of the Closet to the King, on the left.

Heralds.

The Minister of State of Hanover.

The Deputy Earl Marshal.

His Majesty's Ministers.

The Archbishop of York.

The Lord Chancellor.

The Archbishop of Canterbury.

Norroy King of Arms.

Captain of Yeomen of Guards.

Captain of Gentlemen
Pensioners.

Master of the Horse to the Queen.

Groom of the Stole to the King.

Master of the Horse to the Queen.

Lord Steward of the King's Household.

Master of the King's Household on the right, and Secretary to Lord Steward on the left.

Choir of Windsor.

Prebendaries.

Dean.

The Crown of the Queen borne on a black velvet Cushion, by Clarenceux King of Arms.

Supported on the right by the First Gentleman Usher,

Daily Waiter to the Queen,

and on the left by the Second Gentleman Usher,

Daily Waiter to the Queen.

Secretary to the Lord Chamberlain.

Lord Chamberlain, King's Household.

Garter Principal King of Arms.

Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, on the right;
and the First Gentleman Usher Daily Waiter to the King,
on the left.

The Lord Chamberlain to the Queen.

THE ROYAL BODY.

The Pall supported on the right by the Dukes of Newcastle, Montrose, and Beaufort ;
and on the left by the Dukes of Northumberland, Dorset, and St. Albans.

The Canopy supported on each side by five Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber.

The Coffin was covered with a fine Holland Sheet and a black Velvet Pall, adorned with ten Escutcheons, drawn by ten Yeomen of the Guard, under a Canopy of black Velvet.

The Royal Body was followed by the PRINCE REGENT,
as CHIEF MOURNER,

supported by the Marquisses of Buckingham and Winchester ; and attended by the Marquisses of Bath, Salisbury, Headfort, Cornwallis, and Camden,
as train-bearers ;

next followed, as assistants to the Chief Mourner, Earl Delawarr, Viscounts Lake and Bulkeley, Lords Boston, Amherst, Arden, Greaves, Longford, Beresford, Rivers, Grenville, St. Helen's, Henley, and Hill.
Princes of the Blood Royal.

Train Bearers.

The Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen.

Mistress of the Robes.

Ladies of the Bedchamber.

Keeper of the Robes.

Women of the Bedchamber to the Queen.

Maids of Honour.

Women Attendants on the Queen.

Ten Gentlemen Pensioners with their Axes reversed.

Forty Yeomen of the Guard with their Partizans reversed.

As these severally entered the chapel, the van of the procession moved forwards into the choir ; the Windsor knights, pages, ushers, and other officers, ranged themselves around and on the steps of the altar. The members of the royal family, and those noblemen on whom the order of the garter had been conferred, stationed themselves in their respective stalls ; the great dignitaries of the church, of whom were present the Archbishops of York and Canterbury, with the Bishops of London and Salisbury, occupied their respective places within the choir. The royal body, having been carried to the steps of the altar, was placed on the platform prepared to receive it : the pall was removed, and the crown and cushion placed on the coffin. The Prince Regent, as chief mourner, being seated in a chair at the head of the corpse, surrounded by his supporters and train-bearers, standing, the funeral-service commenced in the usual manner, as performed in cathedrals, and at the demise of great and illustrious persons. The first psalm having been chaunted by the choir, in the same finished manner as the anthem with which the ceremony commenced, the service was read by the Honourable Dr. Hobart, Dean of Windsor, in that unaffected and impressive manner which is required by this sublime portion of our rubric. At the end of the first part, the celebrated anthem by Kent, "Hear my Prayer," was introduced, and executed in a very finished manner. The body of Her Majesty was then let down into the vault prepared for it, and the solemnity was closed in the manner usual on these occasions, by the venerable Sir Isaac Heard, who pronounced in a distinct voice, and standing near the grave, the style and titles of Her late Majesty. As the mourners and attendants on this striking ceremony began slowly to separate, and to quit the chapel, the notes of the organ again filled the edifice, and produced at once the richest and most soothing effect. The numerous company separated without the least disorder or inconvenience ; and in a few minutes after the obsequies of Her late Majesty had closed, no vestige remained of the solemn pageantry which had just passed before the eyes of the spectators. The royal chief mourner was magnificently attired in a large mourning cloak, decorated with a brilliant embossed star. Above this appeared first the splendid collar of the order of the garter, the collar of the Bath, the collar of the golden fleece, and the collar of the royal Hanoverian Guelphic order. His royal highness appeared much dejected, and at one time sobbed aloud. The distinguished personages who were present at this solemn scene, deeply sympathized in this afflicting trial of filial affection ; and the public demeanour throughout the whole ceremony evinced a general esteem for the unostentatious benevolence, genuine virtues, and correct example which are now extinguished in the grave. During the funeral service, the royal chief mourner alone was seated. Lord Liverpool carried the sword of state before his royal highness. The Prince withdrew from the sad scene, accompanied by the Dukes of York and Sussex, the Dukes of Montrose, Beaufort, and Newcastle, at twenty-five minutes before ten.

Two Persian princes were amongst the spectators in the organ-loft. They were particularly remarked for the sorrowful interest with which they contemplated the awful scene, and also by the richness and singularity of their costume.

Of His Majesty's ministers, the following were present : Lords Liverpool and Sidmouth ; the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord President, the Right Honourable C. Bathurst, G. Canning, and W. W. Pole.

The appearance of the metropolis was nearly similar to that of a Sunday. At several churches discourses were delivered suitable to the occasion. The sessions at the Old Bailey were opened pro forma, but out of respect to the day, were immediately adjourned. The great bell of St. Paul's tolled at intervals up to the period of interment, which was announced by the firing of the Tower and Park guns. As far as we have learned, the day was observed with equal respect in the country. The royal standard was hoisted half-mast high, on board the men of war in commission at the several out-ports ; and each ship fired thirty minute guns. The same ceremonies were observed at all the garrisons throughout the united kingdom.

THE WILL OF HER MAJESTY.

This is the last Will and Testament of me, CHAR-LOTTE, Queen of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

I direct all my debts, the probate of my Will, and testamentary legacies and annuities, to be paid out of my personal property, or out of the value arising from the sale of the personals, if there should not at the period of my death be a sufficient sum in my treasury to provide for such legacies and annuities.

My property consists of a real estate in New Windsor, called the Lower Lodge, and of personals of various descriptions, those of chief value being the jewels in the care and custody of (), or deposited ().

These jewels are classed as follows :

First.—Those which the King bought for fifty thousand pounds, in the year , and gave to me.

Secondly.—Those presented to me by the Nabob of Arcot.

Thirdly.—Those purchased by myself at various periods, or being presents made to me on birth-days and other occasions.

In the event of the King, my beloved husband, surviving me, and if it shall please the Almighty to relieve him from the dreadful malady with which he is at present afflicted, I give and bequeath to him the jewels which His Majesty purchased for the sum of fifty thousand pounds, and gave to me as before said ; but if the King should not survive me, or if he should unfortunately not, previously to his death, be restored to a sound state of mind, then, and in that case only, I give and bequeath the said jewels to the House of Hanover, to be settled upon it, and considered as an heir loom, in the direct line of succession of that house, as established by the laws and constitution of the House of Hanover.

My eldest daughter, the Queen-Dowager of Wirtemberg, having been so long established in Germany, and being so amply provided for in all respects, I give and bequeath the jewels received from the Nabob of Arcot to my four remaining daughters, or to the survivors or survivor, in case either or any of them should die before me; and I direct that these jewels shall be sold, and that the produce, subject to the charge and exceptions provided for in the first item of this my last Will and Testament, shall be divided among them, my said four remaining daughters, or the survivors, share and share alike.

I give and bequeath my remaining jewels to my four younger daughters aforesaid, or in the event of either or any of them dying before me, to the survivors, to be divided in equal shares between them, according to a valuation, to be made under the direction of my executors, to be hereafter named.

The house and garden at Frogmore, and the Shawe estate, having been granted by act of parliament of 1807 to me, my executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of ninety-nine years, if I and my four daughters residing in England, should so long live, I conceive that these estates being so vested in me, I may dispose of them by will, or by any other deed in writing, and in any manner I may think proper.

I therefore give and bequeath my right and property in the lease and grant of the aforesaid estates of Frogmore and Shawe, with the several buildings thereon, to my eldest unmarried daughter, Augusta-Sophia; but as the expense of keeping it up may prove too considerable for her means, it is my earnest desire and wish, and my will and pleasure, that the possession of the said house and lease, and of the right and the property arising from the parliamentary grant, and from this my disposal of this property. It is also my earnest desire and hope, that in the valuation of such right and property, due attention may be paid to the improved state of the house and grounds, and of the estates, and to their value as now established. In this expression of my wish and desire, as to the disposal of the house and grounds at Frogmore, and of the Shawe estate, I am anxious that it should be clearly understood, that my object is that my daughter Augusta should receive in money the full value of that property, estimated according to my lease of it, and the parliamentary grant, and with a due consideration to the improvements made, whether it shall please my beloved son, the Prince Regent, to reserve the possession of the said house and grounds, and estate, as an appendage to Windsor Castle, or to authorise any other disposal of them; and provided also that the arrangement by which the payment of the amount of such valuation is secured to my said daughter Augusta-Sophia, shall preclude any appropriation of the said house, and grounds, and estate, which shall be directed or authorised, towards giving due and sufficient effect to this my last Will, in respect to the same.

I further give and bequeath the fixtures, the articles of common household furniture, and the live and dead stock within the said house at Frogmore, or on the said estate, to my said daughter Augusta-Sophia.

I give and bequeath my real estate in New Windsor, purchased of the late Duke of St. Albans, as specified in the abstract of deeds annexed to this my last Will and Testament, now commonly called the Lower Lodge, and its appendages and appurtenances, to my youngest daughter Sophia.

I give and bequeath my books, plate, house-linen, china, pictures, drawings, prints, all articles of ornamental furniture, and all other valuables and personals, to be divided in equal shares, according to a distribution and valuation to be made under the direction of my executors, among my four younger daughters aforesaid, saving and excepting such articles as shall be specified herein after, or in a codicil to this my last Will and Testament, or in a list annexed to it.

Having brought from Mecklenburg various property, as specified in the list No. 1, annexed to this my last Will and Testament, it is my wish and desire, and my last will and pleasure, that such property should revert to the House of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz; and I direct that it shall be sent back to the senior branch of that House.

I give and bequeath, as specified in the list No. 2, annexed to this my last Will and Testament, to be paid out of the value of my personal property, within six months after my death.

I nominate and appoint Charles-George Lord Arden and M. Gen. Herbert Taylor, to be trustees of the property herein bequeathed to my daughters Elizabeth and Mary, which property is hereby left to them in the absence of any husbands they have, or may have, for their benefit and use, and for which their receipts shall be full discharge to the said trustees.

I nominate and appoint Charles-George Leveson-Gower and M. Gen. Herbert Taylor, to be executors of this my Will; and I do hereby declare this to be my last Testament.

In witness whereof, I, the said Charlotte, Queen of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, have hereunto set my hand and Seal this sixteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

(Signed)

CHARLOTTE R.

Signed, sealed, published, and declared, by the said Charlotte, Queen of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, as and for her last Will and Testament, in the presence of us, who, in her presence, and at her desire, and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses hereof.

(Signed)

H. TAYLOR,
FR. MILMAN,
HENRY HALI

The blanks in the Will were occasioned by the immediate recollection on the part of the testatrix of the hands or places where the property mentioned was deposited. Thus also it happens, that no such lists stated by Her Majesty could afterwards be found on the most diligent search, on which account the evidence found themselves necessitated to make a joint affidavit to that effect in the Commons, as follows :

Appeared personally the Right Honorable Charles-George Lord Arden, and Herbert Taylor, of Windsor, in the county of Berks, Esquire, and being duly sworn to depose the truth, made oath that they are the executors named in the last Will and Testament of Her Most Excellent Majesty Charlotte, Queen of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, deceased, bearing date the 16th day of November, 1818. And the appearer Herbert Taylor for himself saith, that immediately after the execution of the said Will by her said Most Excellent Majesty, it was delivered to him for safe custody, and he thereupon sealed up the same in the presence of her said Majesty in an envelope from which it had been taken, for the purpose of being executed as aforesaid; and the said Will remained so sealed up in his possession until the death of Her said Majesty, which happened on Tuesday the 17th day of November, 1818. And both the appearers for themselves say that on the following day, to wit, the 18th day of the said month of November, the said Will was opened and read by them. And they then observed the following clause in the seventh page of the said Will, viz. "Having brought from Mecklenburg various property, "as specified in the list No. 1, annexed to this my last "Will and Testament, it is my wish and desire, and my "last will and pleasure, that such property shall revert to "the House of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; and I direct that "it shall be sent back to the senior branch of that "House.—I give and bequeath, as specified in the list "No. 2, annexed to this my last Will and Testament, to "be paid out of the value of my personal property within "six months after my death."

And they further made oath, that no list of property as stated to be annexed to the said Will under the mark No. 1, or any list of request also stated to be annexed under the mark No. 2, were found annexed to the said Will, or contained in the envelope in which the said Will was inclosed as aforesaid.

And the appearers further make oath and say, that they have carefully looked over and inspected the papers left by Her said Most Excellent Majesty, and that no such lists as those referred to in the said clauses have been discovered or found by them, or either of them, and they do verily and in their consciences believe that no such lists were ever prepared by Her said Majesty, and that she same, though it is within the Herbert Taylor, that Her said tion to prepare the lists as under the marks No. 1 and No. 2, and to have annexed them to the said Will, so as to have formed part thereof.

(Signed)

ARDEN,
 H. TAYLOR

The eighth day of January, 1819, the said
 Right Honourable Charles-George Lord Arden, and Herbert Taylor, Esq. were duly sworn to the truth of this affidavit.
 Before me,

(Signed) S. B. BURNABY, Surrogate.
 Present—ILTED NICHOLL, Not. Pub

It should be here observed that the value of the personal property sworn to in the probate was under one hundred and forty thousand pounds; that in consequence of the verbal expression of the Queen's intentions, a very fine set of garnets and brilliants has been considered as a legacy to her eldest daughter, the Queen Dowager of Wirtem berg, and sent to their sister by the princesses here; and that the whole of the wardrobe made and unmade has been given by their royal highnesses to Her Majesty's attached and faithful attendant Mrs. Beckendorff.

ERRATA.

Page 29, l. ult for "sixteenth," read "nineteenth."

65, l. 1, in some copies, for "period," read "fallacious."

169, Miss Chudleigh was maid of honour to the Princess-Dowager of Wales, and not to the Queen.

183, l. 19, for "Luthernan," read "Lutheran."

257, l. 22, for "suppers," read "supper-money."

THE END.

